

Epic of the American Revolution

The Sea Eagles

By JOHN JENNINGS
(Author of "The British Frigate")

SYNOPSIS: The Revolutionary War continues. And two gallant young American navy men have played their parts. Joshua Barney, now married to his Ann, has been captured and exchanged on two previous occasions. Now once again he is a prisoner of the British. Kenny Boyle, in love with Barbary Barney, has lost one hand and all but his life in a battle between the Benhomme Richard and the Scrapis. He says he will not return to Barbary thus mutilated. Now go on with the story—

CHAPTER 21
Joshua and his men were carried to New York aboard the Intrepid. Captain Malloy proved a man of far different stamp from those to whom he had previously surrendered.

Joshua and the rest of the prisoners were herded in summer uniforms. Just as they were being taken into the pen amidships, ordinarily reserved for the hogs, and there held to wait disposition until they reached the gangling city on the island, sometimes called Manhattan, something within, came to New York in the full expectation of some degree of justice. But changes in the British command had been swift and many.

Admiral Collier cared little what became of prisoners of war, and Admiral Rodney appeared only interested in what share of the prize money might be his.

They were put aboard the Yarmouth, and the forty captives all crowded into a space less than twenty feet square, they were passed ashore to find themselves in England—in Plymouth—not long from Christmas Day.

Joshua slipped a hand into his pocket and drew out a guinea, which he flipped and the guard caught expertly and slipped into his own pocket after a quick look around.

Joshua thought of the next day, pretending to be looking over the bundles of greens and knit socks that the women from town had brought to them, and there, sure enough, looking little the worse for wear but nonetheless happy for it, was John Michael O'Gorman.

Joshua eased toward him, and the guard whispered out of the corner of his mouth:

"You wouldn't happen to know of a quiet little tailor shop where you could pick up the uniform of a lieutenant in the British Army—about my size—now would you?"

Joshua grinned, as if he were joking when he said it. But his heart was in his throat for all that.

O'Gorman's eyes averted toward him. "Maybe I do at that!"

He procured the uniform and arranged the means by which Joshua was to find shelter. The day itself came, in May. Again on guard at the inner gate, O'Gorman whispered out of the corner of his mouth:

"Noon!"

At midday Joshua wandered over near the gate. He dropped his hat and snatched out his cocked hat and walked toward the outer gate. A sergeant of the guard glanced at him.

"Good day, Lieutenant!" he said smartly, and saluted.

The guard at the door snapped his moustache at the present. Joshua returned the salute grimly and without a word strode straight through and down the hill.

Within the town he followed O'Gorman's directions until he came to the rectory of All Saints, where the Reverend Lindsey Beckwith and his wife Elizabeth greeted Joshua hospitably. The Anglican rector made it his interest to look after Americans.

The son, Edward Beckwith, was about of a size with Joshua, Joshua seeing the suit of his clothing and seeing him well. That done, Edward was sent to engage a post chaise in which he might drive to Exeter.

Within an hour of the time he appeared at their door Joshua said farewell to his clerical friends and was driving at top speed for the town at the mouth of the Exe.

At Exeter he surrendered his chaise at the Royal Clarence just in time to catch the Bristol coach that left with the dawn. At Bristol he went to ground for a week with the Americans' secret agent at that place—a collector of His Majesty's Customs—until he could obtain several more complete changes of clothing. After that as jaunty as any British gentleman, he rode the top seat of the stage all the way to London, and from there, with the help of other agents, he secured passage aboard a packet to Ostend.
