

Santa and the COWBOY

By LUCRECE HUDGINS

Lonesome Boy climbed up behind Bucky and Dasher sprang straightaway into the sky.

CHAPTER 16
JINDIAN WAR DANCE

"Help! help!" yelled Bucky as he felt himself thrown across a horse. "Santa! Come quick!"

But the Jindians had covered the little cowboy with a blanket that smothered his cries for help. Although he wiggled and fought and kicked, he couldn't escape the ropes that bound him.

The Jindians galloped for hours. It wasn't very pleasant for Bucky to be bouncing up and down on a horse's back with a blanket over his head and not knowing what awful thing was going to happen to him.

"If only Santa knew about this," he thought. "He would think of some way to help me."

He knew he would never have won the two contests with Lonesome Boy if Santa had not made him the wonderful cherry stick horse and the silver tipped arrow. "But there's nothing Santa can do for me now," he told himself.

The Jindians took him to the Jindian camp which was in a forest miles and miles from Santa Land. They stood him on the ground and took the blanket off his head.

He found himself blinking into a great bonfire. On the other side of the fire stood the Jindians. There was Chief Hurricane, and behind him was Lonesome Boy, solemn as a yew, but looking sad at what was happening to the boy who had saved his life.

"I don't understand," said Bucky in a shaky voice. "Why have you brought me here?"

"You shame us," thundered Chief Hurricane. "You win riding contest. You win shooting contest."

Before Bucky could speak Chief Hurricane threw up his hands as a signal. Immediately the Jindians started whooping and dancing around the fire, beating drums and stamping their feet.

Two Jindians seized Bucky and took him away to an empty tent and tied him up. The war dance about Dasher being lost and without had never left his home at all. But then he thought, "Why, if I hadn't come, maybe there wouldn't be any Santa Land left."

Then right away he remembered about Dasher being lost and without. "Oh, if only I had some help!"

Right at this moment a soft voice said, "Me help!" There was Lonesome Boy crawling into the tent!
