CHAPTER 25

He wheeled, jumped to his left and ran. He bounded from side to side in a zig-zag course while the gun behind him thundered and lead whined past him. He reached the buildings on the far side of the street, and now the black robe helped because he became one of the shadows which engulfed them. But he was a moving shadow and he could see other shadows which he knew were men coming out of passages to the street. To turn into one of these passages would be sure death. He kept to the main street.

It couldn't last long. Ahead of him he saw a bunch of men coming at a run, spreading out as they advanced. More of them were coming out of the Palace and other saloons, all with guns in their hands and murder in their hearts. He circled wide to avoid the light from Hannigan's store and as he did so three outlaws came through the doorway and one of them cried, "There he goes!" and once more lethal lead ripped through the air about him.

He cut across the street heading for deeper shadows; he glanced over his shoulder and saw more men coming from the other direction. He was caught between the two groups, trapped. He came to a building with light seeping below cracks under drawn shades. His door opened and he saw a rectangle of dim light with a bulky figure showing against it. Brent had drawn his gun and he automatically lined it up on the man. The man whispered quickly, "Don't shoot!" and then, "Is that you, Tex?" He was Uncle Jim Ferguson.

Tex halted, his gun still covering Ferguson. His gaze flashed to the right and then to the left. The outlaws were closing in, but they had slackened their speed, sensing that they must come upon him soon, anticipating a burst of gunfire from the shadows which lay thick between the two groups.

Uncle Jim whispered, "This way—quick!"

He turned and Brent leaped after him into the hallway and softly closed and bolted the door behind him. Ferguson turned left into his office and Brent followed him. The shades were drawn. Ferguson opened a heavy door and said, "In there!"

Brent entered the gloomy closet and the door closed behind him and he heard a key grate in the lock. There came a bounding on the outer door and the sound of Ferguson's footsteps across the floor as he went to answer the summons. His voice came muffled but distinct, "Who is it?"

Followed the sound of conversation and Ferguson's words, "But he couldn't have come in here; the door was locked. Look if you want to."

Boots thudded on the floor as men came into the office, looking about and then went through the other room and out the rear doorway into the alley. From outside the house came confused noises; the pound of boots on the sidewalk, the thud of hoots in the street, men calling to one another, an occasional jittery gunshot as somebody fired in to the shadows. Gradually these sounds diminished as the search spread to the alleys.

Brent released his drawn breath and relaxed his muscles. For the time being he was safe. Good old Uncle Jim!

He was standing between two rows of hanging clothes, in a closet that was narrow, five or six feet deep and as black as pitch. He moved back until he could lean against the rear wall and stepped on a cloth. He bent and picked up a coat, brushed it off with his hands and hung it on a nail his finger found.

Footsteps crossed the floor and Ferguson's voice came to him, "All right in there?"

"All right, thanks."

"Fine! You'll have to stay there awhile. Keep very quiet!"

Uncle Jim moved away from the door and Brent heard him in a few minutes and the small metallic noises which followed told Brent Ferguson was opening the safe. Somebody rapped on the back door and Brent heard the clang of the safe.
