Chapter 26

Joe dropped Anthea's hand abruptly, and rose, hitching the belt round his narrow waist with an ominous little gesture, and walked across the sun-baked quaside, pushing his way between the spectators to Donald's side. Gently and pointedly he tapped him on the shoulder, and jerked his head toward Anthea. Donald followed him over to the outskirts of the crowd.

"Papa doesn't like people to watch Gina working," said Joe quietly. "It puts her off stroke, and it becomes expensive if she keeps fluffing. She has trouble memorizing her lines, anyway."

Donald was shorter than Joe, but just as broad. A tough, thick-set customer under his over-tailored summer suit.

"She has trouble memorizing anything," Donald said smoothly. "Particularly old friends. I don't see what difference one more face makes, if she can act in front of all this mob." He indicated the small crowd of fisherfolk, vacationists and tradespeople who stood round, watching every movement and listening to every word.

"I didn't say she can act anything," Joe answered, and although his voice was quite calm and unburied there was a dangerous glint in his eyes. "He indicated the small crowd of fisherfolk, vacationists and tradespeople who stood round, watching every movement and listening to every word."

"I'm glad to hear it," Joe refused the proffered cigarette, and a little ostentatiously, took out his own case and selected one of his own. "All these folks are strangers. It's when old friends turn up that you get put off your stroke. Did you want to speak to Miss Scarpi? I'll tell her when she's finished shooting, if you like."

"I was going to ask her to dine with me tonight."

"I'm afraid that's impossible," Joe said at once. "Miss Scarpi has already promised to dine with me."

Donald stared; then a little smile came into the back of his eyes.

"So," he said, still very good tempered, sleekly unruffled, "I'm in no hurry. I've got nothing to do, and nowhere to go. Tell her I'll be waiting. So long." He made a vague gesture of farewell, and strolled off back to the big tourist car. For a moment the attention of the youngsters and children on the quay was diverted from the actors to the spectacular car. Then in a minute it was climbing the steep, narrow street up from the harbor to the main road, accompanied by a clamorous fanfare on the horn. Joe watched him go, his eyes narrowed between their thick dark lashes.

"I suppose," he said, "this means another night dancing. It's not much use expecting Gina to sit quietly with her knitting or a good book. I'll get young Street to come come as well. I'm sorry Anthea. But we do enjoy dancing, don't we, you and I?"

"I can't come, Joe," Anthea said quickly. "We've been working all day. I want to catch up on your father's work tonight, and later I was thinking we might go an hour or so on the play."

"That'll have to wait," said Joe absently. "Look, Anthea, she's got to finish this film; too much has been sunk into it now. This film means a lot to Maria. If it's a success, there's a big contract, waiting for him from World-Wide. This is more or less a tryout. They admire him tremendously. They're a big company, but they're scared of his unconventional methods. If he succeeds—here, there, they will engage him for five years. Let him spend a lot more money, and what is more important to him, give him an absolutely free hand. With Gina he is working with an unknown quantity. He can't have her blow up now. And this Donald—he's a threat to Gina."

"In what way?"

"In many ways," said Joe grimly. "There was a year or more between the time Gina left the company, and the time she came over here to Bianca. Larry Donald belongs to that time of her life. We don't want her upset, and we don't want a scandal. You know we have always said she is like a bad child. Well, so she is. She might run away, or she might drink too much... anything. We've got to be on her all the time. I'll get this right in the car."

"I see," said Anthea.

The scene was finished. Joe and the assistant camera-man removed the scaffolding ropes, and the crowd surged forward to ask Gina and Ivor for autographs.

Anthea crossed over to the cafe, where the scene had been shot, and ordered herself a gin and toner.
