Peg in Washington

BY ALENE (PEG) PHILLIPS

Washington, D. C.—Dear Marian: Highlight of the week for Mrs. Douglas McKay was the luncheon at the White House Tuesday. Mrs. Richard Nixon, wife of the vice-president, the cabinet wives and the wives of the immediate advisory staff of the president were guests of Mrs. Dwight D. Eisenhower. Mrs. McKay has given me highlights on the event. The dining room, with soft green walls, a beautiful wall of lighter wood, the elegance of the attractive mats of drawn work and lace, was made festive with three bowls of spring flowers along the length of the table. Yellow roses, blue irises, several shades of yellow freesias, and white anemones formed the three bouquets. My guess is that as Mrs. McKay absorbed their beauty, her thoughts went back to her home gardens in Salem so dear to her heart. The distinctive china of gold and dark blue carries the presidential seal and the goblets are of matching design. Mrs. Eisenhower's friendly informality set the tone for the luncheon, reports Mrs. McKay. As Mrs. Eisenhower came into the Red room where the guests awaited—in line, in the order of the strict protocol back here—she said at once, "Oh, I am going to enjoy myself today—this is just my family." She has the flair of the true hostess for making persons welcome and putting everyone at their ease. An orchestra played in the hallway and coffee was served in the Red room following the luncheon. A high light was the visit to the living quarters on the floor above—a rare treat as the rooms are shown only to the immediate friends of the family. The president's wife admitted to doing one room over. A large bedroom had been changed from the lavender that Mrs. Harry Truman liked to pink, one of Mrs. Eisenhower's favorite colors. Her own room with delicate green walls has dusty pink bed coverings and draperies. War trophies, swords presented by foreign countries, and the decorations given the general were exhibited to the guests on this special inspection trip. An oval room, the president's study, was gay with a mingled red and white patterned chintz. Some comment was made that in the busy lives the president and his cabinet members lead, the wives seem to be rather useless creatures. But Mrs. Eisenhower spoke up to say that she believed that the men would miss them if they weren't around, even if the men, as customary, spent their time when they were home sitting in the corner and reading. Mrs. McKay felt a bond of understanding with the first lady thinking of the evenings the secretary spends reading reports at home with no opportunity for chatter.

While the secretary's wife was lunching at the White House, the secretary was receiving John L. Lewis at luncheon in his interior department quarters. The bristling eyebrowed labor leader had requested an appointment with Mr. McKay and the latter invited Mr. Lewis to lunch so that he could work the conference in during the heavy schedule of the day. In person, the guest didn't look as heavy or as formidable as in his pictures. The dinner last week honoring Senator Robert A. Taft at which James H. E. Cromwell entertained some 55 guests—a stag affair—included the vice-president, cabinet members, congressional leaders and military officials. The buffet was weighted down with a 35-pound roast, 30 chickens, and two suckling pigs. The following night the secretary was among 1000 guests at the Radio Correspondents' dinner, with Jack Benny as master of ceremonies and entertainers including Dinah Shore, the Marchers, Paul Whiteman's orchestra, and some New York stage stars.

Mrs. Sam Coon accompanied Mrs. McKay to Mrs. Norman Little's tea for members of the White House Spanish-Portuguese Study group. Mrs. McKay and the wife of the Venezuelan ambassador, Senora de Gonzales, poured. Speaking of the Coons, the legislative stenographers at the Oregon capitol were always vocal in their admiration for the distinguished looking senator who was titled the "Walter Pidgeon of the senate," when Sam was representing Baker county here. Today a male member of our interior department was singing his praises as loudly as the girls used to do, emphasizing the warmth of his personality and his humor, along with his horse sense. He said he had gone in to talk with Congressman Coon briefly but remained for two hours.

More later—Peg.
