WITH DEL MILNE

"Well Brownie that's an interesting story about your Randy, but let me tell you about my Charles. You know Charles is our five-year-old son... smart little fellow, always pulling something good. Yesterday he pulled this one out of somewhere—Daddy you said real cowboys always put their boots under the bed and hang up their clothes when they go to bed and daddy cowboys always wash their face and hands before they eat and daddy all big strong cowboys eat lots of meat and... say daddy why don't you take me down to that Oak Room you are always talking about and buy me a great big steak so I will get big and strong like other cowboys?"

From the mouths of babes come the wise advice of ages.

1952 REPORT shows 5,315 more employees since 1947

Immediately following World War II, Weyerhaeuser Timber Company resumed its plant expansion program which was designed to bring about better utilization of forest crops grown on company tree farms. The money to do this resulted from our shareholders' willingness to leave a large share of company earnings in the business.

This money has gone into new pulp, plywood, lumber and other manufacturing facilities. Much has been spent in research and development... improving tree growing methods, developing new products and processing plants, improving production efficiency and securing broader markets.

This program has resulted in many new jobs and more employees. The figures below show a brief comparison of the company's position today with that of 5 years ago. This progress reflects our primary objective... to build a permanent forest industry in the Pacific Northwest which will contribute its full share to national, state and community welfare.

You may be interested in reading our special report dealing with research and development in the fields of forestry, products and engineering. Free copies may be obtained by writing Weyerhaeuser Timber Company, Department of Public Information, Tacoma 1, Washington.
