

Byrne Backs Degree Granting At State's Teacher Colleges

Only two or three states fail to give degrees at their teacher colleges, Chancellor Charles Byrne told the Oregon State Thirty Slaters club last night at a dinner meeting held in the Colonial House south of Salem.

Byrne said he considered this one of the lesser recommendations in the Anderson report, which must be acted upon by the legislature before any of its recommendations can become effective, and the only major one that will not cost the taxpayers money. He said he does not know what the legislature will do at this session but that he is confident that this and the other major proposals will eventually be accepted because they are sound.

Byrne said one of the major problems of the institutions of higher learning is to keep their outstanding staff members in the face of offers of higher salaries elsewhere. Seventy have been lost in the past 18 months, he said. A third of the staff members come from the great institutions of the middle west which pay $1,000 to $2,000 more per year in the various educational grades than Oregon pays, Byrne added. He expressed the view that the Oregon colleges have the ablest teaching staffs today that they have ever had.

Evidence of the quality of work offered here may be found in the increase in graduate students, who now number 1300, and foreign students who now number 428. The numerous grants from outside the state for special projects could not have been secured if there were not recognition of the quality of the men and women who are to carry them out, Byrne said.

Bill Smith, president of the group, presided. Doug Chambers introduced the speaker. Wives of members also attended this gathering.
