CHAPTER 5
Eve came back to the kitchen followed by a gaunt, gray-haired man whom she introduced as Charley Bonn. As they shook hands, she added, "You can do your talking at the table while I get supper."
Bonn took a chair, his faded blue eyes intently appraising as Rimbaud went at the plate of warmed-up potatoes and roast beef. Eve set before him. When she poured Bonn a cup of coffee the old man said, "Thank you kindly, ma'am," but he made no move to drink it. He just sat there, his hands straight on the chair and his eyes fixed on the man before him. When she poured Bonn a cup of coffee the old man said, "Thank you kindly, ma'am," but he made no move to drink it. He just sat there, his hands straight on the chair and his eyes fixed on the man before him. When she poured Bonn a cup of coffee the old man said, "Thank you kindly, ma'am," but he made no move to drink it. He just sat there, his hands straight on the chair and his eyes fixed on the man before him.

"They'd caught him if he hadn't, seems like," Bonn predicted.
But Eve said, "Sam wouldn't leave."
The old man glanced at her, and smiled, and said, "I guess not, considering. But he ought to keep himself hid. No Strip man would get a fair trial in this town. Not now, with Sol Robillarde slated for a seat in the territorial legislature and half the jury panel wanting to take his place as sheriff in the next election."
When Eve refilled Rimbaud's coffee cup he smiled contentedly, thinking how gracious a wife she would make. He contrived to press an arm against her aproned hip, and wished that Bonn weren't there to cramp on their privacy. What more could a man ask than to be waited on by a woman like Eve Odgers? He should've realized that two years ago. Recalling the passionate response of her lips, he said slyly, "The finest flavor I've ever tasted, but none."
"Thank you, sir," Eve acknowledged, believing he referred to the coffee. But she didn't smile, and Rimbaud sensed a tension in her that puzzled him.
Presently Bonn said, "I'm beholden to Sam Malben, same as some others. Our idea is to put a man on Sam's place who's capable of keeping Roman Four from taking over."
Rimbaud knew what he wanted then. And because there wasn't the remotest chance of his taking such a job, he said, "You'd have to pay high wages for a deal like that. Gun wages."
"Sure," Bonn agreed. "We figured on that. But it'd be worth what it cost, for we'd be doing ourselves a favor as well as Sam. Once Rimbaud gets a hold on Spanish Strip, it'd only be a matter of time until he'd start crowding the rest of us, and we'd have to fight for our rights."
"Sounds like the makings of a Sonora Serenade," Rimbaud said cynically. "That's what the papers call Durango's revolution."
"Will you take the job?" Bonn asked.
"No," Rimbaud said.

Death Toll in B.C. Fire Placed at 5

Prince Rupert, B.C. (AP)—The death toll in a fire and explosion which destroyed the King George Hotel here Sunday was placed at five Tuesday.

Police said a thorough investigation showed three men and a woman, all guests of the hotel, were missing. A body found in the basement was believed that of a visitor to one of the roomers.

RUNOFFS BELOW NORMAL
Seattle (AP)—The U. S. Weather Bureau, in its March report issued Monday, said runoffs on most Pacific Northwest rivers will average slightly below normal this year.
