Salem Hopes to Get Ten Players from Coast Clubs

The Pacific Coast league's new open classification should mean more young baseball players for the Western International league in 1953. Such was the prophesy sent north this week by Hugh Luby, 8a-lem Senstor head man, who is now on a three week tour of PCL training camps in California.

The open classification means that the Coast league elubs now will not take option the means that the Coast league the Coast league season gets the Coast league the Coast league season gets the Coast league season gets to the coast league season gets to the coast league season gets the local wind in quantity since the local ownership took over in 1950.

Salmon-Steelhead Cards Due

We are reminded by the Oregon State Game Commission that salmon-steelhead cards for last season expired March 16, and all anglers are urged to get their cards in the mail pronto. Statistics gained from a study of these reports are a great aid to the commission in their future planning. It's one way that anglers can, with scarcely any effort, make a real contribution to the management of sport fish. New cards are now available at all game license agencies, and fishermen anticipating spring steele angling in the orth Santiam, or elsewhere, need only pick up their cards, and start casting.

Anglers Overlooking Backyard Bass

In between rainstorms, when the Willamette is clear and not too high, a small group of valley anglers are reaping a harvest of rough, tough and wonderful large-mouth bass. Right here, in the backyard of Salem, is some of the finest bass fishing to be found anywhere in the country. Oddly enough, Oregonians are so intent on trout, steelhead and salmon, that the bass are pretty well ignored. Up until the "dog days" of summer, our local bass are as game a fish as can be imagined. Taken on light tackle, a four pounder will often leap with the agility of a rainbow trout. As long as the water is cool, the fish stay hard and scrappy. Warm water impairs their condition and edibility to some extent, as it does most fish. Bass, however, are rugged individuals—they can live under conditions that would quickly kill a trout. They are tough guys in disposition, too. They will sock a plug as much out of devilitry as hunger. And it is this vicious, surging slash at the lure that endears old large-mouth to so many sportsmen. The writer, on one occasion, had a bass strike so hard the plug went five feet in the air and wrapped the line around an overhead bridge crosspiece. This fish was visible for several feet before it not the plug; he never even opened his mouth. Clearly a case of sour disposition.

Right now, deep running lures are the best. All sizes and description of plugs and spoons are being used successfully, if fished deeply enough, with a fairly slow retrieve. In bass fishing, the retrieve is highly important, possibly even more important than the lure. The skilled bass fisherman need not take a back seat to any man, as there is much art to this form of angling as there is to fly casting.

It's to be hoped that nore and more folks will learn to of angling as there is to fly casting.

It's to be hoped that more and more folks will learn to love the bass for the excellent fish he is, thereby reducing the terrific pressure on the already hard-pressed trout population.
