CHAPTER 7

The moment Jim Rimboud stepped through the Shiloh's back wing gates he understood that Lew Stromberg was waiting for him. The Roman Four boss stood with one elbow on the rosewood bar. He continued his conversation with Pat Finucane, the night-shift apron, and showed no slightest sign of interest. But he had been watching the doorway and now no longer watched it.

"So ye finally came back," Pat Finucane greeted, resting his huge belly on the bar's beveled edge. He wore a derby all his waking hours to hide a head of hair as a door-knob. "What'll ye have Jimmy, boy?"

"Bourbon," Rimboud ordered, and leave the bottle.

"Ah, so it's celebratin' ye are. Or mournin' the death of that great patriot, Durango. Tell me, James, how'd them North-of-Ireland Federals accomplish the killin' of Durango, God rest his weary soul?"

"A Judas slut sold him out," Rimboud said.

Finucane shook his head. "Wimmin," he muttered. "A man should have no dealin' with them whatsoever."

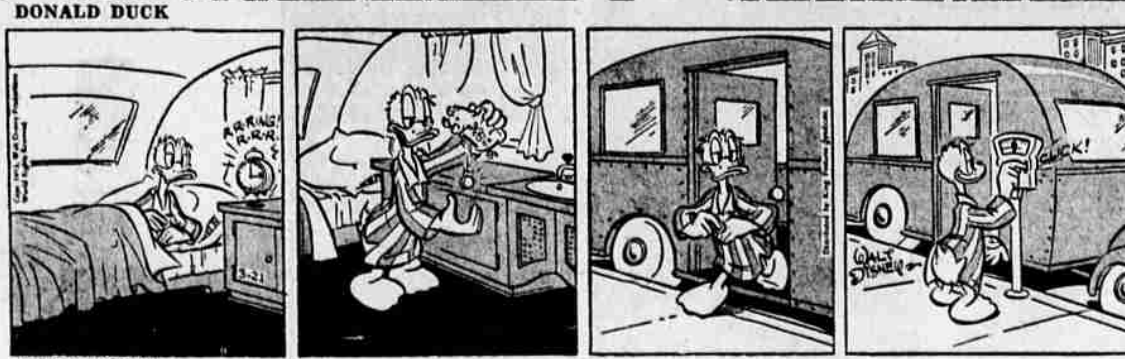

Then as a man at the poker table called, "Bring us a bottle of Colonel's Monogram, Curly," Finucane added slyly, "Nor with saloon clowns that think they're ornamental, bejaysus."

Ignoring Stromberg, Rimboud glanced at the poker table, where five men sat, their faces sharply etched in a cone of light from an overhead lamp. He identified Buck Aubrey, Joe Gabbert and Ponso Peal, who owned the saloon, and noticed that Limpy Smith stood propped against the side wall with an empty glass in his hand.

"Seat open for a poker player," Joe Gabbert called invitingly.

Rimboud shook his head. He poured himself a brimming drink and downed it, and was pouring another when Lew Stromberg asked, "You in the market for a job?"

"No," Rimboud said, not turning to look at Stromberg. And now, as he lifted his glass, Rimboud

Lewis-Clark Papers Found

St. Paul (AP)—A collection of papers dealing with the Lewis and Clark northwest expedition 150 years ago has been found in an attic here, the State Historical Society announced today.

Some of the papers, described as "priceless," were written in the barely-legible scrawl of Capt. William Clark and included notations by his colleague, Capt. Meriwether Lewis.

The society said the discovery of the papers was "the greatest of its kind in decades."

Research workers found the papers in January and stored them in vaults. The announcement was withheld until the papers could be properly evaluated, the society said.

Dr. Harold D. Cator, director of the society said there are 67 pieces of manuscript in the collection, dating from December, 1803, to April, 1805.

He said the last section deals with the winter the group spent near Bismarck, N.D., and closes with the departure for the mountains and the Columbia river.

The society said the papers were found in the home of Mrs. Burnside Foster, St. Paul. They were found in old desks stored in the attic.
