Gunfighter's Return

By LESLIE ERNENWEIN

There was a light in Maiben's cabin, and now, as Bonn was on the verge of announcing himself, he observed the vague shapes of horses standing in the yard. Two or three of them.

Charley pulled up at once. Thes horses meant that Rimbaud had visitors; unwelcome visitors, most likely. Then, as he tailled three horses near the house and heard another moving over by the corral fence, the full significance of it burst on Charley Bonn: The riders of those horses were doubtless Roman Four men, and they were in the cabin—which must mean that Jim Rimbaud was sither dead or disarmed!

That startling realization struck Bonn with the impact of a physical blow. If Roman Four could so swiftly eliminate Jim Rimbaud from the fight what chances would lesser men have against Stromberg's bunch? He hadn't "Bull's-eye!" the Roman Four ramrod shouted happily. "Sing him again in the same place!" Rimbaud rolled with the punch, rocking back on his heels. Twin trickles of blood ran from his flared nustrils. He shook his head. He staggered sideways as if dazed, and Bonn thought: He's going down!

He dreaded what he would see down!

He dreaded what he would see when that happened.

But Rimbaud wheeled abruptly and targeted Bill's bandaged hand with a jab that brought a pain-spawned shriek from Booger Bill. The massive rider seemed to go beserk then. He barged at Rimbaud with the wild blindness of an enraged bull.
