CHAPTER ONE

The boat chugged in from the ocean and made straight for Minicipal Pier. It looked ridiculously small to be carrying fish as well as fishermen, but out went the usual cloud of gulls to blot it from view. Then, suddenly, Ruth Carlisle heard the roars of Mr. Hufford in rage. "Thieves!" he bellowed. "Blasted, bread -snatching thieves!"

Flercely the fat artist from Maine defended his own. He waved his straw hat, he kicked, he denounced the gulls uiridly. But food was food, and whimsical Rod Pantussi happened to be sprinkling a lot of it on the deck behind the artist's broad back. Then it happened.

Rod cried a warning, but it wasn't heard, Oblivious to all but gulls and pelicang, Mr. Hufford stepped on a fish. "Timber" screamed Ruth from the pier. The man -mountain skidded, fought helplessly for his balance.

Came the crash!

At which point he bellowed, "I at which point he bellowed her would tell her so. She'd

Came the crash!

At which point he bellowed "I quiti" and once again the Carlisles had a problem on their hands.

Ruth scowled. She went back to the bench under the awning and studied Nancy's pale, working face. Wasn't it time that Nancy found a new favorite? Hadn't penniless Mr. Hufford been the hotel's non-paying guest long enough? "Your hero," she sighed, "What's the next bright ideas"

Down the pier marched Seventeen to the berth of the Dauntless Me. As the fishing-boat came nearer she smiled alluringly at Rod in the bow. "Rod first," she announced grimly, "Or would you rather see Johnny skulled first?"

"It'd better be Johnny, Rod will toss you to the sharks," Sulking, the fat artist remained where he'd fallen. Spotting Nancy Sulking, the fat artist remained where he'd fallen. Spotting Nancy on the pier, he waved a ham-like hand. "I've quit. Nothing but buffoonery and a blasted ocean and alimy fish!"

Announced Captain John ny Lord: "You'll lose your pay, Huffie."

"Blast it, I owe the hotel a hundred dollars!"
"Well?"

The great man struggled to his feet. Sumburned, wet, grimy, he made a sad sight after his first day as a commercial fisherman. Looking at him, Ruth felt pity. Then Mr. Hufford took up his position in the bow and, watching him, she changed her mind. Obviously rough treatment had been what Mr. Hufford needed. Clearly afraid to blunder, the huge artist did an incredibly expert job of helping to warp the boat into the slip.

Nancy Carlisle met her sister's helping to warp the boat into the slip.

Nancy Carlisle met her sister's amused eyes, and scowled. The wages happened to be grim necessity. Their father had been pleasant about it, but quite firm. It was pay up by the end of the next week, or be evicted. That had been the decision, and there'd been an expression on Mr. Carlisle's face that had clearly said he wouldn't compromise again.

Ruth chuckled, enjoying the warm sun, the smells and sound of the sea, the haggling, "You're lucky," she told the fat artist. "You'll never meet finer men or do more important work. And doesn't it make you feel good to know that you're paying off your debt?"

"Til never cat another plece of Til never cat another plece of know that you're paying off your debt?"

"I'll never eat another piece of fish! Don't serve it to me, because I'll send it back to the kitchen." Sadly the artist dropped a bucket overboard. "Blast it, I should be painting!"

Ruth remembered the waiting Bob, and left. "All well?" Bob got out of the car and tossed a cigarette away. "Do you think Fatso will live?"

"All perfect, Bob. He may hate menial work, but he's sticking things out."

Bob had more important things on his mind. He wanted to ask the question of questions. He scowled. He turned his back on toiling Mr. Hufford and the immense sea, He studied the rosy oval face, the lovely sight Ruth made in her belge wool dress. He wanted to kiss her then and there on the spot.

He caught her arm as she sought to turn right instead of continuing straight across Ocean Road to Henderson's Park.

Give me your tired, your poor, your mixin' of Ben' A IN CENSOR AN' your huddled masses yearning to breathe free. The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.

Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me. I life my lamp beside the golden door."
