Explanation Given for Recent Crescents in Sky

By J. HUGH PRUETT (Astronomer, Extension Division Oregon Higher Education System)

Late in the morning of March 17 my telephone rang. A woman was calling. "During the radio program over the * * * broadcasting company a little before the explosion of the atomic bomb this morning, the announcer was discussing the conditions existing around the advanced camp. For one thing he said there was a thin crescent moon hanging in the eastern dawn sky. My husband and I saw a crescent moon in the western twilight last night and can't believe that the announcer was correct." I don't know what the announcer saw in the eastern sky that morning, but it was not Luna. The moon was "new" at 3 a.m. PST on Sunday, March 15. This meant that it was passing almost between us and the sun. By Monday evening it had moved far enough east from the sun so that it was seen as a thin crescent low in the western twilight. I saw it myself. As always, the sun was lighting half the moon's surface but only a slight amount of this half was turned our way. I can imagine this explanation: Perhaps about Thursday or Friday morning preceding the explosion on Tuesday, the announcer had been on the location and had seen the waning crescent in the eastern dawn as it was approaching the sun for the new phase. (Some call this morning crescent a new moon, but it is really getting thinner and has not yet reached the "new" phase.) Perhaps the announcer mentioned did not bother to look for the moon on "explosion morning," but not being an "expert astronomer" assumed it was still there. I have recently surprised observatory guests by showing them that the moon is not the only crescent that appears in

Open House at Chemawa Soon

Chemawa—Open house will be held at Chemawa Indian school between 1:30 and 3:30 p.m., April 23. The school is six miles north of Salem and a mile west of Pacific highway 99E. It is the oldest nonreservation boarding school for Indians operated by the federal government. It was established in 1880 at Forest Grove and moved to its present location in 1885. The public is invited to visit the school to become acquainted with the educational program being offered to the 250 Navajo students from New Mexico and Arizona, and to the 350 students from the northwest, enrolled chiefly from Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Northern California and Montana. The educational system has two types of program, the 12-year regular and the five-year Navajo programs. Training is given in trades, agriculture, homemaking and cultural development, so that students may take their places in the social, economic and political life of the northwest. The high school is accredited by the Oregon State Department of Education. The five-year Navajo program is planned to meet the needs of non-English speaking Navajo students aged 14 to 18, who have had little, or no, previous school experience. The program is aimed at making the pupils literate in English and to prepare them vocationally for jobs on or off the reservation. The instruction in the first three years is carried on largely with the assistance of a Navajo teacher-interpreter.

Independence — In 1951, Central High school PTA, together with the school's faculty, adopted a program whereby eighth grade students might become adjusted to high school life. Of importance is the opportunity of eighth grade students to visit Central high school for one complete day. Monmouth eighth grade will visit on April 27, this year; Henry Hill eighth grades on April 29, and the rural eighth grades May 7. An evening has been organized on Thursday, April 30, so that parents and students alike can hear the school's program explained. Later on, each grade class is visited in the individual schools by a faculty member. Further questions are answered and the student's final choice of electives is made at that time. Arrangements are also made for the transfer of records of the elementary school experience. Finally arrangements are made so that all eighth grade students can report next fall one-half day ahead of the remainder of the student body. At this time they get their actual schedule and locker assignments, so a complete orientation to the student is possible before the opening day.
