CHAPTER 5

The trees ached in a puff of wind. Bees droned, twittering birds darted blackly across the sky. Twilight became a shade darker. Soon it would be time to examine and separate and deal with the dinner; soon it would be time to call up gayly like any of the further pleasure of hotels guests. But in the meantime there were her thoughts to examine and separate and deal with once and for all. To be perfectly fair about it, Bob's patience had been sorely tried for more months than it should have been. She should either have accepted a ring or stopped dating him. She shouldn't have been necessary to write the note he'd given her that strangely childish letter of a man in pain.

She scowled, looking over her shoulder as the big front door opened. She met her mother's blue eyes and smiled self-consciously, a wonderful if her mother was so rich. She always seemed to get away when something had gone wrong. The sky was all rose, and she and the ocean look on the appearance of a tranquil, sea-colored lake. Clear Lake, she thought, looks that way in the east, and she wondered if she couldn't spend the summer up there. Perhaps she needed weeks of beauty and solitude, a opportunity to relax, the nice to really think.

"Remember Clear Lake, Mom? member the fun we had up there a couple of summers ago?" Ellen Carlisle smiled reminiscently. "Such fun, she drew in a pleasant contralto. "We were sky to return alive!"

"At least one could think there. And all the people you met. Pleasant. They weren't, always giving a girl problems?"

"It Bob the problem?"

Ave filled the girl's brown eyes. "Mom, you are psychic!"

"No such thing," Ellen Carlisle claimed.

"Bob didn't take you to church, didn't invite you to spend the afternoon on his farm. Bob hasn't here since last Monday. Bob isn't made his nightly telephone call in over a week, enough?"

"He wants me to marry him. It's either that, or he'll off what he calls the merry—"

"Are you sure you don't love m. Ruth?"

"How can you tell? There, will u just answer that?"

The click of wooden balls came faintly from the croquet lawn, momentarily silencing the flitting, ring birds.

Ellen Carlisle chuckled. "Mr. Huford gave me ten dollars extra this morning. And Johnny told me, eye putting him on permanent— isn't that exciting? All Mr. Huford ever really needed was money to take an interest in. He'll be all right now."
