Mr. LeGarie Done Forgot His Shoes

Here's one fisherman who got a near limit of trout the second day of the season and acquired a pair of new shoes at the same time. However, the latter were not acquired without financial consideration.

Lloyd LeGarie, Court street restaurant operator, is the individual involved. He and Mrs. LeGarie went to their favorite little lake in the Blodgett country early Sunday. Lloyd changed his crepe soled shoes for fishing boots beneath a bridge.

In his haste to get at the business at hand, he left his street shoes where the exchange was made. The LeGaries subsequently decided to try their luck in Fudding river and took off for that stream with the driver deciding against changing footwear.

Fudding river did not prove fruitful, so they concluded home was the best place. Upon reaching the automobile, Lloyd discovered the absence of his street shoes. They were still beneath the bridge where he left them.

"No use going back now; somebody else is wearing my shoes by this time," concluded the fisherman.

He has one consolation, however. He and his wife shared a meal of fish from the lake early in the day. On top of that he bought a brand new pair of shoes—for cash.

When the reader cannot be edified by the news-picture it is conceivable that he might justifiably be entertained. But humor in photography is difficult to come by. Unless the photographer is so gifted, and few have displayed that distinction, the amusing picture is likely to be considered corny.

Flood Control Cut $190 Million

Washington (AP) — The Eisenhower administration Monday whacked 190 million dollars out of former President Truman's budget for flood control and navigation projects in the fiscal year starting July 1.

A budget sent to congress Monday cut the item to $471,240,000. Truman in his budget sent to congress last January recommended $661,524,100.

The Eisenhower revision dropped several big projects including Ice Harbor Lock and Dam, Wash., for which Truman asked $4,900,000.

The revised budget also made available to 10 big projects a total of 10 million dollars of funds it said would be available to army engineers from current appropriations.

A surplus fund was said to include unexpended balances not needed for some projects and unspent balances from projects started last year but for which no funds were recommended for the coming year.

News Photographer Has Occupational Problems

By BEN MAXWELL

That over-worked Chinese cliché about one picture being worth a thousand words may have been true in the days of Confucius. Easy photographic processes associated with the development of halftone reproduction for newspaper usage have resulted somewhat in a loss of face for this gem of Oriental wisdom.

Despite the efforts inventive news photographers, equipped with the electronic flash and other wondrous gadgets of the business, their ordinary accomplishments elicit no more attention than the uninteresting story or the dull editorial. When the photographer tries to be cute and winning he is most frequently rewarded with justifiable derision. He gets a yawn from the indifferent reader sated with juvenilia. On another page he tries for a shocker. But sharp focus on the anatomical details of the latest disaster are almost as revolting to the reader as they were to the photographer who saw them first hand. Gruesome pictures from two world wars have satisfied most morbid tastes. And so it goes through cheese-cake, prurience and crime. Our pampered readers only glance and hurry through the edition.

Even Mr. Big and lesser Bigs always available for a camera study except when they are accused of peccations, educe only the reader's shrug: "Uh! those guys again" and another page is turned. Propagandists, quick to utilize the brooding melancholy of a monochrome photograph to depict human misery, have overdone the business. Critical readers now suspect their purpose and believe it's a phoney.

What, then, in heaven's name, does the base public want to see in news-pictures? When the threadbare subjects conceived to shock, allure and promote are rejected what remains for news picture comment? Much may better be accomplished by the artist and the cartoonist. Yet, a lot remains for the cameraman.

New and significant accomplishments that contribute to human welfare and better living appear to be acceptable and worthwhile picture material. What the reader is getting or not getting for taxes that keep his nose to the grindstone is now a pertinent subject that lends itself to photography. Exceptional manifestations of nature never fail to arouse interest.

When the reader cannot be edified by the news-picture it is conceivable that he might justifiably be entertained. But humor in photography is difficult to come by. Unless the photographer is so gifted, and few have displayed that distinction, the amusing picture is likely to be considered corny.
