CHAPTER 6

And the meal began.

With Langley Curtis across the table from her. Ruth found it is solly meal. The man had apparently been everything. While soup was served and consumed, Mr. Langley Curtis discussed certain of the queer customs of Siam. Baind found him not at all reductant to recite stanzas of his favorite poetry—a performance that delayed the meal for the simple reason that his musical baritone held Maggi Colahan uterly spelibound. But it was when the roast ham came that Mr. Langley Curtis really got rolling along into high. Then he talked about radio, about the propriam he'd had for fourteen years, about the people he'd met all over the country itself. And vibrato crept into his tones. Color came into his face, now enthusiasm glowed in his remarkable purple eyes, He didn't chat, but expounded. Yet it was agreeable to be talked at rather than talked with. He mad a beautiful command of the English language. Then abruptly, while you were hungering for more, he proved himself to be a real genius by stopping.

"But I talk too much." he chuckled, laughing at himself. He fulling a gay glance at his nephew seated beside Ruth Carlisle. Dantells me that's a bad habit of mine."

Later Dan Curtis dropped into the chair beside her on the verranda. "You're too tense, Miss Carlisle. T've noticed that you never really relax. For instance, you're not now. Here's something to do. Unclench your hands. And if you'll remember that relaxed hands mean a relaxed body, you'll be better off.

She looked down at her hands. Startled, "Well, for goodness sakes!"

He laughed softly, "You might remember," he began, then stopped, For now with sirens and done and relaxed hands mean a relaxed body, you'll be better off."

Be looked down at her hands. And if you'll remember that relaxed hands mean a relaxed body, you'll be better off."

Be looked and her hands. And if you'll remember that relaxed hands mean a relaxe

She looked down at her hands, startled. "Well, for goodness sakes!"

He laughed softly, "You might remember," he began, then stopped. For now with sirens and honking horns, the quiet was being effectively shattered. Up the curving gravel drive through the curving gravel drive through the park-like grounds came several limousines, with two motorcycle cops zooming along before them to clear the way. Thunder filled the night; then came the sound of the front door, and excited people from all directions to learn what was going on. They weren't kept in suspense. From the most imposing limousine stepped Mayor Luchetti himself. He waved his elegant walking-stick he flashed his gold-toothed smile. He met the baleful glance of Ephraim Carlisle on the veranda and floridly bowed. "My fine friend, always it's a pleasure to see you!"

"Grook!" roared Ephraim. "Politician!"

Ruth rushed to her father's side.

"Crook!" roared Ephriam. "Politician!"
Ruth rushed to her father's side. After all, he hadn't yet been named to oppose Mayor Luchetti in October! "What a pleasant surprise. Mayor Luchetti! Won't you come in?"
"Such a sweet girl." crooned the mayor. He stalked into the living-room, resplendent in checked suit and purple necktie. Behind him came Sean O'Malley, owner of the Golden City Spectator, and Miss Westerterp, president of the Golden City Historical Association, Announced the mayor:

"We come for to make the welcome, Mr Carlisle, not for the argument. We come for to welcome the great Langley Curtis to Golden City."

In strode Dan Curtis, and with him came Nancy and Ellen Carlisle, Dan Curtis grinned placatingly, "My uncle happens to be ill. By the way, how did you people find out?"

Nancy Inched backwards toward the door.

find out?"

Nancy inched backwards toward the door.

The redheaded owner of the Golden City Spectator grinned faintly. "Oh, we have eyes and ears, sir, ou're Daniel Curtis, of course." He glanced about. "Any objection to introducing us to your uncle? We're honored to have h'm among us, of course."

"Soon, gentlemen, soon, My Soon, gentlemen, soon. My le still isn't up to it." Mayor Luchetti stared. "Then why you no send for the doo? You think small town she don't have good doo? Hahl He's a great doc even if she's crazy for to have a hospital here."
