CHAPTER 6
Ruth went back to the car. "All right, we'll make it a party. Dan, you and your uncle, my folks, Mr. Hulford and Johnny Lord and—"

"Bob O'Brien?"

She turned on the ignition and started the motor.

"He's a child! He's just a sulking child and I don't care if I never see him again!"

Dan shrugged. Bob was no concern of his. "Where do we go today?"

"You could visit Dr. Fell. He's been asking me to bring you to his house. He's interested in you, of course. It's not often that he meets doctors around here."

"A strange man this Dr. Fell. Few people like small towns enough to practice in them for forty years."

"He's a small-town man, and so looking so superior, Dr. Dan! I had a chat with your uncle yesterday. He told me you were born and brought up in Burlington."

"But I've seen other places, you see."

She nodded. The obvious thought came along and she held her foot on the brake. "Then if you don't like small towns—"

"I didn't say that, I was discussing Dr. Fell. I may be as strange a man as he. You know I really wanted to be a doctor. That was my ambition almost from the time I was old enough to have one. But we were poor. My uncle paid for my education. When I finished my internship he needed someone in New York, and of course I went. Why not? I owed him a debt, and it was a debt that had to be paid."

"He told me you were a big help."

Dan Curtis laughed strangely. Looking off to the left at the roofs of the town, he wondered what the reaction of the people would be to the real story. Would they be to the father and him, or would they hang him outright? "I was a big help."

"Why do you say that way, Dan?"

"I didn't help him keep his career, did I?"

SMILE YOUR PRETTIEST!

It was a thought. Not an important one, but nevertheless a thought. He pondered it as she drove inland toward Main Street. The poor, he reflected, would be a problem. Of course it could charge the rich three times the ordinary fee, he could afford to carry those who couldn't pay. But time on the other hand the hospital would be small and there wouldn't be many beds available for charity cases, much as he might want to care for them.
