

The Voice of Love

CHAPTER 13

Blue eyes shot her a fierce glance from under shaggy, tufted brows. Moving with heavy deliberation, Doctor half rose from the chair on the veranda of Crescent Moon Bay Hotel, but he didn't smile. "Been waiting for you," he said gruffly. "Don't you ever help your folks run this place?"

"Doctor, I'm very busy. We're nearing the end of the term, and you know what that means."

"I had no choice. He was waiting in my car. This will astonish you, I'm sure, but the truth is I was practically kidnapped."

He folded his hands on his lap. "Have you read the paper?"

"No. But Bob told me all about it." She wagged a finger chidingly. "Aren't you a bit ashamed? I didn't take Dan to see you so that you could scold. I wanted you to hire him and go away on a vacation."

He said crisply: "There's a dangerous young man, Ruth."

Steel striking on flint produced the usual spark. "I think that's a terrible thing to say! Doctor, if you came here to draw me into the argument you're wasting your time. I like Dan Curtis. I think he's a fine man."

His voice grew harsher. "I won't say he should be banged, but I do say he should be drummed out of the profession which he's always been too busy to practise up until now."

"That's quite enough!"

"That's only the beginning. And don't bring up the fact that you think you're in love with him. It isn't pertinent."

"On the other hand—"

"We had the grand talk," he went on. I offered to take him in without cost. He countered by offering to make me the director of his hospital if I would agree to stop practicing for a community hospital."

He shook his white-haired head, utterly baffled.

"He growled. He threw his head back to belch the score for those who cheapened the noblest profession in the world. But he met the large, glowing brown eyes and they brought him back to a reasonable state of calm. He remembered that people had to be led, not driven. He remembered that Ruth was the daughter of the Civic Betterment Society's candidate for mayor. She had to be won over, if he were to support Dan Curtis the result would be defeat. There it was, as simple and horrible as that."

"It works this way," he said heavily. "With the community hospital out of the way, Dan Curtis and several businessmen will build a hospital. They'll establish a monopoly. Top rates could be charged and people would have to clamor for admission. A larger hospital would be needed. Since Dan Curtis's hospital would be serving a need, the city would naturally be asked to contribute so much toward the construction and maintenance of the new place. More money rolling in, a bigger business asset, of you wish. A business, no less. So much profit on each broken leg, so many dividends on so many operations. Pretty, eh?"

"Ridiculous," she chuckled.

"There, that's why you need a vacation. You've been working too hard and it's left you worn out. In the first place, Golden City wouldn't stand for that. In the second place, Dan isn't that sort of man."

He heaved a long sigh. "He's that sort of man. I'd be paid for doing exactly nothing except keeping my mouth shut. Don't you understand? It isn't the idea of service, but the idea of making money."

"And what's wrong with a doctor making money?"

"Nothing. I'm all for it. But there's a difference between making money and gouging people. What do the poor do, will you tell me that?"

"He'd take them in, I suppose."

"How could he afford to, unless he overcharged those who could pay? Now stop being silly!"

"Why don't you ask Dan all that, Doctor?"

"I intend to," came the grim rejoinder. "I may as well tell you now that I shall fight this thing through to the bitter end."

"This was more serious. Suppose Doctor won? Suppose Dan had to go elsewhere to practise his profession? Suppose Dan left before all this confusion inside her had been dealt with? Suppose—"

"The thing I want to know, Ruth, is what you propose to do."

"That was when Dr. Ambrose fell in his anxiety to protect his people, made his big blunder."

"Now look here! Obviously he's honing up to you for a business reason. You're Ephraim's daughter. If you side with him against me, against your father, it'll have an effect on the outcome, and you know it. So—"

But there was where Ruth's mind caught up with his words. Anger shot her from the chair. "What an evil thing to say! Doctor, how dare you!"

"This isn't a game, Ruth. Carlie, the lives and welfare of people are involved."

But she'd dwelt in tension too long. "I won't listen to you!" she cried. "I think you're the most hateful man I've ever met, so there!"

Before he could recover his aplomb, she'd turned on her heel and gone running into the family's cottage at the rear.

In her flight he had his answer, and the answer left him somewhat disturbed.
