Patterson to Seek State's Power Share

Governor Outlines Oregon's Stand on Hell's Canyon Issue

By JAMES D. OLSON
Regardless of whether dams on the Snake river are constructed by private interests or by the government, Oregon will insist upon its proportionate share of power generated by such dams.

This was the statement made Thursday by Governor Paul L. Patterson on his return to Salem from a governors' conference called by President Dwight D. Eisenhower in Washington, D. C.

The governor said that regardless of the northwest power pool, under which all power developed in the northwest is channeled, Oregon will insist on a clause in the license issued by the federal power commission guaranteeing a certain portion of the power from the Snake river in perpetuity.

The northwest power pool is a volunteer arrangement," the governor said, "and while there is no indication that it will be broken up in the foreseeable future, nonetheless Oregon must be assured of its rightful share of power regardless of whether the dams are built by the Idaho power company, the federal government or a PUD."
