

The Voice of Love

By WILLIAM NEUBAUER

CHAPTER 19

The story was duly published in the Golden City Spectator and Ephraim Carlisle was duly annoyed. He came clumping into Ruth's room the following Thursday, a copy of the newspaper in his hand. "That's the sort of fellow he is," he shouted. "He does one piece of charity, and right away takes a bow for it."

"He does no such thing. I gave that story to the paper. And don't you dare explode! You and Doctor have spread so many rotten rumors that someone had to do something to counteract them."

"We speak the truth!"

"You don't. You're just so intent on having your own way that you won't even listen to other ideas."

"Don't you talk that way to your father!"

"And stop shouting at me! This is my room. How dare you come into my room and shout at me?"

Eileen Carlisle came running. She took in the two flushed, half-purplish faces, and erupted. "What a fine sight the two of you make. Shall I fetch knives? Shall we have a blood-letting here on the spot?"

"Simplistic, father and daughter," said Ruth.

"I have a date," Ruth announced. "Incidentally, Dad, I've decided to help Dan dig up some customers. Doctor could send some to him, but he won't. So that means I'll have to use some salesmanship."

"Dan Curtis should go and beg Doctor's pardon. He should declare for a community hospital. He should prove himself willing to crawl in order to learn to walk. Then, maybe, Doctor would take him under his wing."

"He won't do that, Dad. You wouldn't, either?"

He turned and went out of the cottage. The door banged loudly behind him.

"Thank you for not laughing, Ruth."

"Hello, Mom, are you still talking to me?"

Merry were the brown eyes; happy was the warm young face. Love had made the girl bloom. Now she stood there a woman, or at least a reasonable facsimile of one. She led her mother over to the made-up Hollywood bed. She waved her to a seat on the dull green monk's-cloth cover. "Dad's crazy, Mom. So's Doctor. You can't talk with them. You mention Dan and they walk almost apologetic! So on it goes. And the first thing you know, someone will have a great fall."

Mrs. Carlisle nodded her head. "I've been thinking of visiting my sister down in Los Angeles. You know how your Aunt Harriette's been wanting me to come down. Well, how'd you like to take charge of the hotel this summer? That would leave your father free to campaign. We'd pay you well, of course. And it would be a great help to me."

"Mom!"

"And, of course, it would be a great help to Dad, wouldn't it, if you were ultimately to marry him? You could save money. But more important you'd learn to admin-later the affairs of a big, going business. Or are you to be one of those wives who sit at home and let their husbands do all the work?"

"You see, Mom, they're all against Dan. You should hear the people in town. Doctor's stirring them all up. He's out for Dan's throat, and he doesn't care who knows it."

"And Dan, dear, could be named the doctor for this hotel. It would bring him in a certain amount of money."

"That was an idea!"

"Well, think it over, Ruth. I think I won't leave until August at the earliest."

"The bell rang out in the living-room. Bob O'Brien, grinning, bowed gallantly as Mrs. Carlisle opened the door. "Long time no see, Mrs. C."

"Bob, how nice. My goodness, you've put on weight."

"Too much weight," said Ruth crisply.

Mrs. Carlisle left them alone in the parlor.

"Bob sat down. He was in work clothes and looked somewhat warm and tired. "Can't stay but a few minutes. I'm up to my ears in a business deal. You look well."

"How formal we are!"

"Have to be. You're a lady of distinction. At least everyone's talking about you all over the area. You'd be surprised to know what a celebrity you've become."

"Am I beast or hero, Bob?"

"What do you think you are?"

"I hate to be on the outs with Dad. And I don't want to become involved in this fight. But, fair's fair. People are entitled to a chance. Doctor's not giving Dan that chance. Neither is Dad. They don't like one of his ideas, so promptly they leap to the ramparts and scream all sorts of horrible things. I don't believe in that. I do believe people should have their chance."

"So do I," said Bob. He chuckled. "I like your eyes, Ruth. They're sweet eyes. Do you think our children will have your eyes? I hope so."

He said dryly: "But you believe that everyone should have a fair chance. You just said so."

A growl rasped in her young, shapely throat.

"But go on," he said suavely. "Why won't he and Doctor get together?"

"Let me answer that," said Dan Curtis. (To Be Continued)
