

1000 to Be Called to Fight Oregon Forest Fires

By PAUL W. HARVEY JR.
(Associated Press Correspondent)

A thousand men, women and girls, backed by more than 35,000 loggers, soon will be taking to the woods in the annual effort to maintain Oregon's proud record of forest fire suppression.

They will work for the State Forestry Department and district fire patrol associations. They will guard and fight fire on 12 million acres of state and private lands, plus 2,500,000 acres of O & C federal lands in Southern Oregon.

The federal forestry experts say it's good forest management when fires burn less than 1/8 of 1 per cent of the forest land a year.

Oregon did a lot better than that last year, when 22,278 acres were burned, or less than 1/8 of 1 per cent of the total. The cost of this huge job of saving the state's forests is paid by the logging operators through assessments against their land. Soon, as the result of a 1953 law, there will be a $750,000 state emergency forest fire fighting fund, and the logging operators will maintain this fund through a severance tax on timber.

Oregon is divided into 15 fire patrol districts. Nine of them are association districts, which are operated by associations of logging operators. The other six are State Forestry Department districts.

The districts have almost 100 year-round men, who fight fires in the summer, and spend the rest of the year maintaining equipment.

About 800 employees are hired during the fire season, including personnel for fire fighting crews, and 145 lookouts.

These lookouts are mostly college boys and girls, school teachers, or husband and wife teams. They man the towers at the mountain tops, ready to report fires, and to try to put them out before they spread.
