

Old West Still Lives In Eastern Oregon

The old west still lives in scenic Eastern Oregon. Cowboys may be seen punching and branding great herds of white-faced Hereford beef cattle, and Indians are at home on large reservations.

Each September, participants gather at the famous Pendleton Round-Up. Indians camp in the style of their powwowing predecessors and cowboys vie in contests of riding, roping, branding and bulldogging. It is a great event to watch.

Throughout this country are panoramas steeped in the romantic lore of early explorers, fur traders, and pioneer settlers. On Oregon's eastern boundary is the Grand Canyon of the Snake river, deepest chasm on the North American continent. Geologists and others interested in antiquity are fascinated by the fossil deposits found in areas once inhabited by prehistoric animals.

This shining land still carries memories of yesteryears in its setting of rich farmland, great irrigation projects, pine forests, and high plateau country.

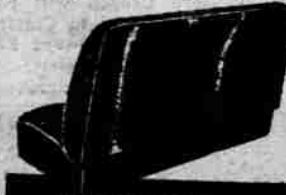

Although petroleum is produced in 35 countries, the United States produces and uses more than the other 34 countries.
