

Mt. Hood Top Vacation Spot

Mt. Hood, only 55 miles from Portland, offers recreation at any time of the year, but this "top of Oregon," 11,245 feet above sea level, is a particularly attractive place to visit during a summer vacation or week-end trip. One can travel around the mountain by using the Mt. Hood Loop Highway upon which he can go along the south and east of the mountain into Hood River, then return to Portland and Willamette Valley points on the scenic Columbia River Highway, now rebuilt at water level, speeding up the trip without in any reducing the scenic view.

Through the summer guides are available to ascent of the mountain by those who like their recreation rugged. The Forest Service maintains 50 improved campgrounds in the Mt. Hood National Forest. For those who just like to admire the grandeur there is the mountain itself with its eternal snows, forests, lakes, streams and Alpine meadows.

Camping Facilities In 30 State Parks

A new procedure was inaugurated by the Oregon state highway commission in 1952 with the opening of overnight camping facilities in 30 of Oregon's state parks throughout the state.

Of this number some 28 camps are of unimproved nature ranging in size from 4 to 15 campsites and provided with tables, wood stoves, water and latrine facilities.

Camps of this type were operated in such state parks as Champoege, Armitage and Maud Williamson state parks in the Willamette valley; Humberg Mountain, Jessie M. Honeyman, Neptune and Short Sand Beach state parks on the Oregon coast; Dabney, Benson and Viento state parks on the Columbia river and at the Cove Palisades, Shelton, Red Bridge and Catherine Creek state parks in Eastern Oregon.
