

BURNED FINGERS

By KATHLEEN NORRIS

Chapter 1

The little theater was cheerful enough on a grim January day. Each small table was a checked red-and-white cloth and was decorated with a slim glass vase and three jonquils.

Jennifer Richie sat at one of the little tables, the farthest one from the door under the slant of the stairway, and waited. She was a woman waits when a child is in the surgery or when a strong drug is fighting in the hands of doctors and nurses to have an indispensable life.

Her tragic young eyes moved from the clock to the doorway, the doorway to the clock. But they took in everything else too. The little tables, the lurching, murmuring women, the smart cashier at her raised desk, the pretty girl having such a good time with the so obviously infatuated young man. Every time there was a bustle of white shadowy figures, Jennifer's heart sprang up: that might be Sid.

Finally it was Sid—only twenty minutes late. But when she had been twelve minutes early, and the added minutes dragging by had made it a long wait. And even now it was not much better. For Sid looked just his usual compact, well-groomed, self-possessed self. No look of concern, nothing new and serious in his aspect. Just Sid, the man she had adored from the first moment her eyes had fallen upon him; not rich but with much more money than Jennifer had ever before seen so casually spent; not handsome exactly, but with the sort of assured, aristocratic confidence that all women loved. Sid, whose years were twenty-six to her eighteen, who seemed grown up and sophisticated and wise beyond her wildest girl-dream of a lover.

He slid out of his shabby, hand-some coat, Sidney Burrows, IV, could afford to wear a shabby coat when it was of that material and that make. His smile was just the impersonal smile she expected as he took his chair and picked up the bill of fare.

"Hello," he said. "What cooks?"

"Literally, what cooks?" she echoed with a shaken laugh. "Apparently everything we like today. Crab Louis and sand dabs—every day one."

"Only I'm not hungry," he said. Jennifer's heart for some reason she could not quite analyze sank in a moment of chill misgiving. When Sid said that world of rich people—people who had beautiful homes down the peninsula, people who played golf and tennis and gave big dances for their young daughters—was not much more intimate, much more real, when both she and Sid were ravenous. "I was down at my aunt Clara's last night," Sid explained, "and I didn't get up until after nine. Miss telephoned the office that I had a touch of flu but would be in later."

"Oh, how is Miss—as pretty as ever?" Jennifer did not belong to Sid's world, and she knew it. When Sid said that world of rich people—people who had beautiful homes down the peninsula, people who played golf and tennis and gave big dances for their young daughters—was not much more intimate, much more real, when both she and Sid were ravenous. "I was down at my aunt Clara's last night," Sid explained, "and I didn't get up until after nine. Miss telephoned the office that I had a touch of flu but would be in later."

"You ever seen her?" he asked, surprised.

"Only her picture in the paper," Jennifer said. "You don't remember the girls who get their pictures in the papers?"

"I do when they're your cousins," Jennifer countered.

She was really hungry, but when Sid said that all he wanted was a salad and coffee Jennifer asked for the same things. Her heart began to beat fast as the waitress put water glasses and butter on the table, she remembered how much time, and if he would not open a serious conversation she must.

"I was sorry to telephone your office, Sid. I know you hate that. No, I don't hate it at all," he said amiably. This was all bad; there was a wall between them. Jennifer tried to recall some of the phrases that had been running through her mind; her thoughts for days had been on this hour.

"Sid, I'm so troubled—I'm so ashamed—you must know how I've been feeling these last three weeks. I'm not like that, I'm not like that. It's like a nightmare to me. If we really love each other—and you did say in that first note that you never would love anyone else—"

She discarded them all. Her mind and soul began to spin in a sort of panic; time was passing, nothing was getting said.

"Sid, I mean you, Sid looked up from his salad.

"Yes?" he said expectantly. So cool, so untroubled himself!

"It's this, Sid. It's this, Jennifer persisted, feeling a little frightened never stirring in her, and glad of the courage it afforded. "I keep thinking that—that if what we was was wrong—and we know it was—I was thinking that—that loving each other will make it right. . . . I mean—I mean—"

She floundered to a stop.

"It's nothing to get all worked up about," Sid said in a low tone, looking at her watchfully with a sympathetic and amused air.

She could not talk against this sort of thing, with no help. But she must talk to him now. Her heart shrank away from her thought that if she failed now she might not have another chance, but she knew in her mind that it was true.

"I mean, you talked about our getting married, Sid. That night in Phil Neville's apartment the first time, when I went up and we had supper. Remember, you said we were engaged?"

"I remember perfectly. But—get married? What on?" the man asked reasonably. "I haven't seen a job. I've got a desk in my uncle's office, where I fool around drawing airplanes all day, but I've got no salary. Uncle Dick keeps talking about something turning up. But the only thing that will really turn up is my toes when they need that desk and fire me," Sid said lightly.

"I know. But it wouldn't be just that. I just to have someone supporting me that I'd be like that we might get married. I couldn't leave home now—there's Betty and the girls. But we love each other, Sid. And you said . . . you said . . ."

"We do love each other, and I hope we always will," he said.

"What makes you think I've stopped loving you?"

"But—but you haven't telephoned for days. We haven't been out to a movie or just to have tea, for—let's see—two weeks ago yesterday," Jennifer faltered.

"Well, so what?" he said. "Don't worry. I'll be around one of these days. . . . How about dessert? Let's have a card again. I'll have a grapefruit and you'll have that disgusting mixture of gingerbread and cream cheese I saw your eyes light on it from the first minute."

"Then—and this is the last thing I mean to say, 'I'd—we are engaged'?"

He looked up at her, looked at the tip of his cigarette.

"Yes, I know. I did. And I said deliberately. And she knew with a sudden sickness of soul that this conversation was costing him something too, that there were things he felt he must say to match the fact that she "I wouldn't say that," he continued in the dead silence. "I'll tell you," he went on with a little effort. "Let's leave it like this: we'll not see each other. We'll think things over. And then if we naturally come together again and like each other—why great."

"Is there anything to think over?"

"Good Lord, yes. Money and rent and—everything like that."

"But you told me . . . you said . . ."

"Yes, I thought you were well about everything, and I still think so. Let's not look so serious about all this. Let's consider it settled for the moment anyway. We see each other when we can, and we like each other a lot, but no more telephoning, because it just sets me in Dutch with my uncle. Now! Let's see something about your little sister. What's she been saying lately?"

Jennifer tried for a cheerful response, hating herself—hating him, that he could force her into this false equanimity, proceeding meanwhile to hurry through his dessert, ask briefly for the check. Only a few weeks ago they had loitered over this same table until half past one, and just two o'clock, when Jennifer hurried back to the office glowing and thrilling, indifferent to the office manager's sharp reproof, indifferent to everything except the swimming, shining story of her love. That time was dead.

Sid walked with her to the corner; explained he had to go to the city hall on an errand for his uncle.

"Sid, it's this," she caught at his hand as he extended it in good-bye. "Mightn't it be that someday you'd—would be glad if we stayed together? You might be sorry that you—ended it this way?"

"Ended what? He would not understand her. "Listen," he said. "you don't have to take things so seriously. Quit it. You know I'm terribly fond of you. There's no percentage in making me feel badly or feeling badly yourself. I'll telephone you soon and we'll look up something. Let's let things cool up a while. Don't let things get you down. You make me feel like a heel. And now listen—aren't you late? I've got four minutes to one."

"I can make it," he said. They parted on the phrase, Sid giving her hand an extra squeeze for farewell. Jennifer walked on in a daze; she had hoped and feared many things of this interview but just because she was actually seeing Sid, actually to talk to him, the fact she had told herself, had been absurd. Five minutes together would make everything right.

Now the talk was over—everything was over. And nothing for Jennifer would ever be quite right again.

It was January 1936. Jennifer had a job with a big accounting firm. But it was dull. "All," she said, found public school work sometimes boring. Even interspersed with museum visits and movies, gym and folk dancing and handicraft, there had been long, empty hours in school. But school only lasted from nine o'clock until three; there were Saturdays and Sundays, Christmas and Easter vacations, and the long midsummer freedom of time work was different. From half past eight until half past five it was hard to do monotonous things in which one had not the slightest iota of interest.

She worked in a long, bare loft furnished with 72 desks, chairs, wastebaskets, and files. These articles and everything else in the room were of the cheapest possible description.

Jennifer had been an employee of Tyrrell, Jenks, and Simons for more than a year. She had come in just before her seventeenth birthday, trembling almost to sickness in the excitement of taking her first job, unable to believe that any work she could do could possibly be worth the salary of eleven dollars and fifty cents a week. Miss Griegs had given her a brief explanation of what she was intended to do: kindly Mollie Evans from the desk that touched Jennifer's desk, had supplemented the information.

All this had been Greek to Jennifer respectfully listening, but she had felt a passionate gratitude toward Mollie for Mollie's instructions. She had helped her to start. Much of it after 13 months was still Greek.

Before she had been many months in the office her superiors, at least that she was having an appreciable influence on the other girls. There were prettier women in the office, and quicker ones, but little Miss Rennie was a nice air. Prompt and quiet and conscientious, the detested Miss Griegs said she wished she had a hundred of her.

After the first few fluttered days Jennifer had settled down to chronic boredom. While she worked or listened to lunchtime gossip or went about carrying meaningless papers to men or women who would scrawl additional meaningless hieroglyphics on them, Jennifer dreamed. And especially she dreamed on a certain type of winter or early spring day when rain was steadily falling and wind drummed without like an orchestra, for the office was on the top of the big building and the roof was reinforced with tin.

To Mollie Evans' desk as to some of the others, a pencil sharpener was firmly screwed. Jennifer went over there every morning and exchanged a few words with Mollie before settling down to the lone grind of the forenoon. At twelve a shrill whistle brought every girl to her feet, stirred hunger pangs in Jennifer's stomach.
