Planes Used in Viewing Timber

The use of an airplane to examine forested areas has saved considerable time in selecting timbered tracts to be sold during 1954, according to Unit Foresters in the Salem Forest District of the Bureau of Land Management. On August 19 and 21 the BLM foresters flew from tract to tract in northwestern Oregon, circling tentative sale areas for closer examination to determine the feasibility of offering them for sale during the next calendar year. Included in the areas inspected were tracts that had been suggested for consideration by logging and forest products companies. Unit foresters, Bert Herstine, Everett Meier, Sam Heaney, and Don Madson said that they were able to accomplish in two days what would have required weeks by auto and foot travel. Bert Herstine said that the particular tracts in question could be located quickly and accurately from the air. The age class of the timber; extent of damages from fire, wind, or insects; density of stocking; and most logical logging routes could be easily discerned.

The plane used was a Cessna 180, one of 17 operated by the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine. Pilot Lamoureux said that he had been flying observers earlier this summer on a cooperative re-survey, of blowdown and insect damage in Oregon and Washington. Arrangements for the use of the plane in the Salem area was made by District Forester, Rodney O. Fety.
