Navy Bans Film For Army Sake

Washington (AP)—The Army thinks it's all right for its soldiers to see the movie "From Here to Eternity," a hard-boiled account of barracks life.

But the Navy has banned it from the screens it controls as "derogatory to a sister service"—the Army.

The Air Force, which works with the Army in reviewing pictures, also has approved the film for showing on its screens.

All services have banned another movie, "The Moon Is Blue," which the Roman Catholic Legion of Decency put on its condemned list.

In this connection a service spokesman said it was standing policy to reject any movie that offended a racial or religious group.

Old Style Cuts Found in Case

When Wynkoop-Blair, proprietors of a local printer at 490 Ferry street and successors to the Ross E. Moores Co. recently removed the top of a quad case owned by their predecessors they discovered the section covered by proofs of line etchings owned by Moores when he was a leading Salem printer nearly 70 years ago.

Among these old style cuts, that must have been a display board for Moores when he was a book and job printer at 203 Commercial street in 1889 is a New Year's greeting designed dated 1885. Another mentions Jasper Graham, proprietor of the local soda works and Capital Brewery operated by Kilinger and Beck.

Other cuts were obviously designed for use in catalogues and in advertising by nurserymen and gardeners since they depict luscious bunches of grapes and splendid fruits with a mouth-watering appeal. Other cuts, designed for use upon mining stock and other speculative shares, present a noble vista or mythological figures representing honor, justice and integrity.

Particularly interesting are a series of fraternal symbols consisting of eyes, somewhat foxed by moisture and time, calligraphic diagrams and what appears to be the casual observer as up-side-down keyholes.

In addition to these, breeders of animals might select from Moores' the image of a powerful percheron, a productive cow or a race horse obviously first and near the finish line. But chickens and Nubian goats have no place in the Moores collection of 60 years ago.

State Police to Issue Safety Tips

Oregon state police have been instructed to stop all passenger car traffic in the state at certain times and places to issue a safety sheet to drivers. It will urge them to "please help us to make the approaching holiday a safer one."

The appeal, which will be distributed to drivers or passengers during the week before Labor Day is followed by five rules aimed at accident prevention. These rules are: drive at reasonable speeds, give advance warning for stops or turns in traffic, stay on the right side of the road, pass only when completely safe to do so, and keep a safe distance between cars.
