AMA to Study Health Plans

WASHINGTON (AP)—A spokesman for the American Medical Assn. said Monday the association "feels that it should not attempt to comment at this time" on President Eisenhower's health message to Congress which proposed, among other things, a system of federal "reinsurance" of private health insurance plans.

Dr. Walter B. Martin, of Norfolk, Va., president-elect of the AMA, and one of a group of AMA officials who were shown copies of the Eisenhower talk Monday a few hours before he delivered it to Congress, said in a statement released by the AMA's Washington office:

"Until today, we have been given no opportunity to examine the administration's proposals and come to any conclusions. After we have had a chance to make a careful study and review of all his proposals, we will make a detailed statement."

Capital Journal Bldg. Will Be Leased by City

The Salem city council voted last night to lease the Salem Capital Journal building with an option to buy it within five months for $75,000.

The building is just across the alley from City Hall on Chemeketa street. The Capital Journal and the Oregon Statesman, morning daily, recently merged their production plants in the new building now known as the Statesman-Journal building while keeping their independent editorial entities.

Bernard Mainwaring, publisher of the Capital Journal and owner of the Capital Journal building, told the council he had an opportunity to sell the building at a higher price but felt the city should have first chance to purchase it.

The city will pay about $400 a month, based on mortgage interest, insurance, taxes and merchant policing costs. The council voted unanimously to take the lease and option.

Mayor Al Loucks said no immediate use beyond possible storage is contemplated for the building. The council adopted a resolution authorizing City Manager J.

L. Franzen to negotiate for sale of the city's property on Trade Street between South Commercial and South Liberty, which, the members believed, would more than pay for the Capital Journal and the cost of altering it for city usage.

If the property cannot be sold council members indicated they would favor submitting to the people a proposed bond issue for the purchase price of the Capital Journal building. Alderman Dan Fry opposed a bond issue.

In the early days charcoal was used for the smelting of iron and serious damage to many forests resulted by heavy cutting to produce it.
