FROM Peg in Washington

BY ALENE (PEG) PHILLIPS

Washington, D. C., Jan. 19

Dear Marian:

From 83 degrees on Sunday afternoon in Miami to 15 degrees that night in Washington was our chilling experience in flying home from an inspection trip of the Everglades National Park. Secretary and Mrs. Douglas McKay had a strenuous five days in the southland but memories of the balmy weather, the bright blue ocean, bays, and streams, the supreme meals, and friendly hosts will remain for a long time.

It would take me several letters to describe all that happened and all that we saw. Among one of the outstanding recollections was the boat trip through the park lakes encircled with mangroves and buttonwoods to the rookeries where thousands of birds were nesting. The birds, lacy-plumaged egrets, ibis, and herons, because of their white feathers made it appear that the trees were in full bloom as there were masses of birds on the rookeries. The small boats moved from lake to lake through mangrove tunnels. Another boat trip that was enjoyed in the leisure of a Saturday afternoon was through the Ten Thousand Islands on the west coast of Florida. We were taken out on the Gulf of Mexico and on the way back both of the boat loads tried a bit of fishing but with only one non-edible fish landed.

The problems of the Everglades area and the Seminole tribes were pointed out to the Secretary during the inspection tours and discussed with him in arranged conferences. However, it is not interior problems that I propose to report to you—merely the lighter side of the Florida adventure. For example, the marvelous spot on the west coast of Everglades where we spent part of Saturday and regretfully left on Sunday morning. On Peace River, it was indeed peaceful. River traffic of sport fishermen's boats and a few commercial craft added color but no noise to the scene. We were housed in new apartments of the club occupied for the first time by our group, and the rooms were fresh, attractive, and commodious. The chef formerly worked for Von Hindenburg and was brought over by Barron Collier, the father of the present operators of the Rod and Gun club, following a European visit. One of those chefs who delights in artistic as well as gustatory triumphs. A first course that entranced us was individual strawberry trees. Bright red berries were stuck on the branches of a simulated feathery green plant in a small white and red flower pot, the top of which was covered with powdered sugar. Plucking the berries from the trees and dipping them in the sugar was a painless and pleasant exercise.

On the route between the east and west sections of the Everglades, we stopped for an airboat ride through the shallow waters near a ranger station. The boat's propeller is in the air back of the passenger's bench, and the light boat can skim through three inches of water, through grasses and reeds, at a clip of some 35 miles an hour. Seated so near the water or ground the speed seems even greater. A great thrill it was to follow the tiny creek through the glades and then when we swung around in a wider spot, out flew a seat cushion straight into the propeller blades. The cushion was thoroughly chewed by the blades and a shower of feathers enveloped us for a moment. Hours later I was still combing them out of the "curls." The park service men wondered whether Secretary McKay would be willing to ride on the boat. As we watched his boat returning, we discovered he was running the airboat, which has a stick similar to an airplane to guide it, and the park people had no further doubts as to his participation in the tour.

So much more to tell—of the glamour of Miami Beach, of the famous Vizcaya estate, where we found the director to be Robert Tyler Davis, former director of the Portland Art Museum, of the trees and birds and wildlife, of the dinner party given by Oregon automobile dealers for the Secretary and Mrs. McKay and the other displaced Oregonians in Interior, of the many entertainment features—but maybe you'll let me ramble on a bit more next week.

Till then, As ever, Peg.
