QUESTION: What is an Insurance Exchange?

(Following quotations are from "Insurance" by A. H. Mowbray, eminent insurance authority.)

"The Exchange is an unincorporated body . . . and the business is conducted by an attorney in fact. The person taking out a policy of insurance becomes . . . a member or subscriber of the Exchange . . . The policies are issued by the attorney in the name of the subscribers who are the actual insurers of each others contracts.

"There is always an application . . . because it is necessary to secure the signature of the insured . . . for the attorney in fact. This is the most important difference between the application used by an Exchange and that used by a corporation.

"In at least one state (California) the law has been amended to permit the issuance of nonassessable policies. If the Exchange has surplus equal to one and one-half times the minimum capital required of a stock (insurance) corporation . . . its subscribers are not subject to assessment. Except as he may be bonded, the attorney is . . . almost a private proprietor with no liability for losses because it is not he who is insuring but the subscribers . . . Thus, insurance in an Exchange usually costs less. Exchanges acquire their business through agents who customarily represent them to the exclusion of other companies.
