Push-button Railroading By SP Expanding Rapidly

Push-button railroading is expanding this summer on the Southern Pacific's lines from Eugene to Crescent Lake. L. P. Hopkins, superintendent of the railroad's Portland Division, said today Centralized Traffic Control installations are being hooked up to a central control panel at Eugene at the rate of about a siding a week. Seven SP signal crews, he added, have completed the intricate installations along approximately 21 miles of line so far, linking Eugene with Springfield and Mohawk Junctions, Natron, Dougren and Dexter. SP plans to complete the 95 mile circuit to Crescent Lake by mid-November, which will bring to 273 the total miles of line over the Shasta Route under Centralized Traffic Control. CTC, Hopkins explained, is a complex electronic system by which a dispatcher can better control the movement of trains, so allowing heavier-than-normal traffic loads to be handled more efficiently over a single track. By pushing buttons, he can line up switches and set signals to direct an engineer on a train many miles away. The expedited train movements made possible by CTC mean many more trains can be handled, with their running times substantially reduced, and more cars and locomotives can be made available for shipping in the area. The project, part of a large-scale Southern Pacific modernization program, is costing SP about $5,800,000. Previous CTC installations on the railroad's Shasta Route were between Redding and Black Butte, California, and Klamath Falls and Crescent Lake.
