

HORSE TRAINER

Trainer Randall puts his eight Palominos through precision drill in hip stand. His only cues to horses are by whip motions and words.

BREAKING IN A BRONC'

Randall uses special kind of harness to make bronco turn his head—the first step in training him to be lead pony in a show.

.. Then with soft-spoken voice cues Randall gets his horse to lie down. He made this bronco into a riding horse within few days.

Another breaking-in lesson: Randall uses can of rocks which he shakes near horse to overcome shyness and get accustomed to noises.

Randall's son, Cory, puts Elmer, a Palomino, through bucking stunt. Movies have used Elmer for his bucking ability.

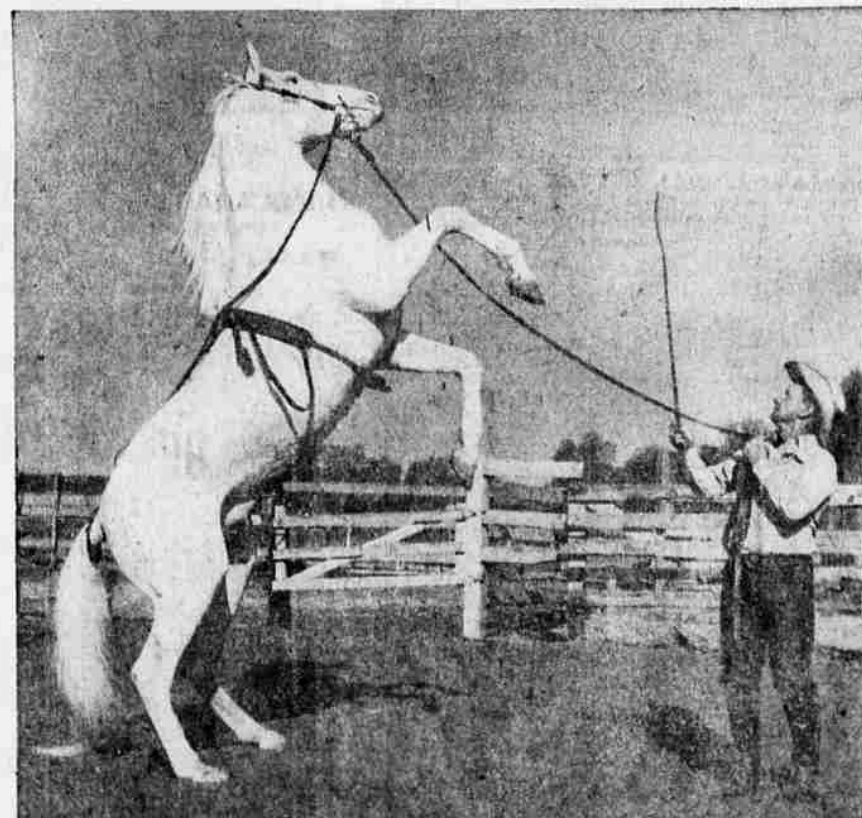

With whip-pointing cue, Randall teaches Trigger, Jr., Roy Rogers' famed movie horse, to whinney or open his lips.

"Kindness and soft words are a great asset in training horses," says Glenn H. Randall of North Hollywood, Calif., the famous professional trainer.

Although he specializes in teaching horses what to do in shows, circuses and motion picture work, he also trains wild horses for ranches, for stock shows, parades and rodeo performances. Randall believes also that much of his success is due to the fact that he gets the confidence of the horse before he starts basic training.

For 15 years, Randall has trained many horses that have become trademarks for famous cowboy actors, such as Trigger and Trigger, Jr., for Roy Rogers, Hi-Yo Silver for the Lone Ranger and Koko for Rex Allen. He also coached Midnight for Casey Tibby, four-time world champion cowboy. These famed horses are boarded at the Randall ranch where he schools them constantly in their tricks.

Here is how Randall puts his horses through their paces.

A shake of the whip and a few words, and King, an Arabian-bred show horse, gracefully rears up on his hind legs. Randall's training has perfected King's showmanship.

Smart Palomino is taught to carry Cory Randall by coat collar from training ring.

This Week's PICTURE SHOW by AP Staff Photographer Don Brinn

