Forest Home Fees Increased

New rates on summer home lots under special use permits in the national forrets will become effective January 1, 1956, it was announced today in Portland by Regional Forester J. Herbert Stone.

The new rates are the result of a nation-wide study extending over several years, the purpose of which was a re-examination of the summer home lot fee structure. Stone pointed out that no increase in fees for the use of summer home lots has occurred in recent years. "Many summer home permittees have been expecting such an increase in the face of rising prices generally," he said.

New minimum rates which apply to certain areas have already been established. For the more desirable summer home sites, increases above the minimum rate for a particular area are made according to a region-wide formula. These desirability factors include such things as accessibility, availability of electricity and water, scenic values, and adjacent recreational opportunities such as boating, hiking, swimming, fishing, mountain climbing and similar attractions.

All new summer home permits being issued will be at the revised rates.

MORE $$$ FOR STRIPS

In Hollywood these shapely strippers formed the League of Exotic Dancers, served an untimatum that employers "must do something about a wage scale of $85 a week" they get when they take 'em off. From left, "Champagne," Daurene Dare, Jenny Lee, Rusty Lane and Novita. (UP Telephoto)

Land Reform Program Breaks Reds' Hold

EDITOR'S NOTE: One reason the Communists made such headway in Italy was because of the lopsided distribution of land. A man who was one of the first to push a land reform program is now premier. Here is a report on the program.

By ROBERT E. JACKSON
United Press Staff Correspondent

ROME (UP)— The gentleman farmer who started a revolution in Italy five years ago expects to win the payoff battle by Christmas.

Antonio Segni, 64-year-old author of the revolution which transformed hovels into homes, ditches into fields and Communists into Democrats, hopes to hand over the last acre under the land reform program this year, halfway through the 10-year project.

It will signal a victory for Italian democracy and a triumph for Segni, now Italy's premier.

But distribution of the last plot to the last peasant marks neither the success of the program nor its end. In the next five years the government will help the new landowners develop their property.

It will pump in 650-million dollars in aid and advice to the new proprietors. But by 1960 it is scheduled to pull out, leaving inexperienced farmers to go it alone.

A generation hence the estates so carefully carved from the rich and given to the poor may be "big" again. Already some farmers are planning to sell out to more enterprising neighbors. And a tendency to collective farming has set in.

One thing is sure. The night Mrs. Antonio Segni received a bottle of perfume five years ago she could not have dreamed what her husband was starting.

Segni, as agriculture minister, gave his wife the perfume to prepare her for the news that he was going to hand away 30 acres of their own estate in Sardinia.

Today 1,222,337 acres have been distributed to 93,247 families.

The government found a simple method for deciding whose land to take. Italian landowners have a historic habit of declaring their holdings almost worthless to avoid taxes. The government took their word. It expropriated low-value land of more than 741 acres which was not cultivated intensely. The owners were paid with 25-year government bonds bearing 5 per cent interest.

On the other hand the government picked beneficiaries by need and without political discrimination from lists compiled in villages where five to 15 people often lived in a single room. The standard allotment was 15 acres.

The peasant is not given the land. He buys it at low cost and easy terms amounting to about $30 a year at the outset. After 30 years, when the land is finally his, the peasant will have paid about $2600 for his 15 acres.

Already it has brought about startling results.

In the Po River delta south of Venice, from the Tower of Pisa along the Via Aurelia to Rome, in the islands of Sicily and Sardinia, in the Italian boot's heel and toe, rocklands and swamps have been transformed into waving green fields, manicured orchards and neat rows of electrified stone houses.

But the project does not lack for critics. The landowners, needless to say, never liked the idea. With rightwing power growing in Italy, they will fight any extension of the program. The Communists, their thunder stolen, have fought the project too and incited peasants who did not receive land.

On the other hand, many former Reds have ripped up their party cards and become Christian Democrats. Whatever the political outcome, the production of food on these lands is up two-thirds. In an over - populated, underdeveloped country, that is a revolution in itself.
