Conclusion Reached in Circuit Court Case Started in 1951

State Statutes Ruled Constitutional by Pro Tem Judge A circuit court case that had been hanging fire since Dec. 12, 1951, reached a conclusion Thursday when Lester W. Humphreys, judge pro tem issued an opinion holding that certain Oregon statutes were constitutional.

The litigation originated with the filing of a complaint by Wilbur J. Smith and by Arrow Tug and Barge Co. as plaintiffs in intervention. The complaint challenged the constitutionality of the laws under which the state tax commission fixed and determined ad valorem taxes on tugs, barges and vessels and apportioned the assessed values among the several counties which had levied taxes thereon.

Judge Humphreys held "that it is clear in reading these statutes that there is nothing arbitrary or discriminatory therein because the statutes apply to the Columbia river and its tributaries as well as all other rivers in the state. Private carriers are assessed and taxed as well as common carriers and carriers to hire."

Original arguments in the case were heard Dec. 12, 1951 by Circuit Judge Rex Kimmell. While briefs were being submitted Kimmell died and the matter has been held in abeyance since.

Mail Carriers To Get Carts

The Salem post office is in receipt of a dozen satchel carrier carts which will be turned over for use of city mail carriers. They are government issue and will be used by the carriers without cost to them.

Carriers who have physical disabilities will be given the first allotment. However, others are to be ordered and it is expected all will be provided with the bag totes in due course.

The vehicles are similar to those which were purchased by a half dozen carriers during the past two years. They are constructed of aluminum, with two large wheels in the rear with two smaller ones in front.

They are fitted with a hand-operated brake which prevents the rick from rolling when parked on a hill.

The machines are built in Portland and are so constructed that they can be placed in a mail storage box when knocked down.
