Dr. Louise Wood Seyler—The Los Angeles educator, chosen woman of the year in education in the Associated Press women's editors' poll, starts a busy day in her office.

'Woman of Year' Tells Of Education Problems

Editor's Note: The following article was written by Dr. Louise Wood Seyler, deputy superintendent of Los Angeles city schools, voted woman of the year in education for 1956 in the Associated Press women's editor poll. In it this distinguished educator outlines some of the problems that face America's public schools.

By DR. LOUISE WOOD SEYLER
Written Exclusively for AP Newswriters

The public schools of today are faced with many problems. The fact that schools are faced with problems is nothing new, but the type of problems becomes increasingly complex. I am referring particularly to the pressure from the community for the assumption by the schools of greater and greater responsibilities. An elementary school which concerned itself only with the Three R's would be most unsatisfactory to a modern community, I assure.

Let me explain by an example or two: Today we take for granted that we must furnish some type of health services. Today we gear our program to the education of all of the children of all of the people. This means the atypical child as well as the typical. This means the child handicapped with physical problems as well as the physically perfect child.

The pupil in high school is faced with a program of many requirements. Each of these requirements is fine in itself, but we are at present almost to the point where anything new to be introduced means withdrawal of something being taught at present.

Many of us have seen the day when graduation from the eighth grade was the accepted thing. We are now in an era when graduation from high school is the accepted thing. This is as it should be. If the future citizens are to live successfully in a highly complex world, they must know much more in many fields than the high school graduate of 50 years ago.

Since 1900 our population has increased 100 per cent. Since 1900 our high school population has increased 1,400 per cent. With an increase like this unheard of any other place in the world and with the demands for schools to assume new responsibilities, educators and laymen alike need to take a long look into the crowded curriculum of today.

How can we best meet the needs of all the children? Parents are entitled to believe that their children will have the basic foundation for successful adulthood. The classroom teacher with the many pressures of daily lesson assignments and subject requirements cannot always spend as much time with the individual as he would like. Early in the educational career, counseling and guidance help must be given, so that each individual in our public schools has the time and thought of an expert in thinking through with him the requirements necessary to make him a successful adult citizen.

It is my hope that we shall never lose sight of the individual in mass education. Each child in the United States of America is entitled to as much education as his ability permits. How best to achieve this goal is the responsibility of educators and far-thinking community leaders.
