Today in Salem

The best seats in the house will be given away for the Tuesday night concert of the Portland Symphony orchestra at Willamette's Fine Arts auditorium because nobody wants them.

Seats contradictory? It's simple. Balcony seats are the choice seats for the concert as they give the fullest range of sound from the orchestra. But the front row, which normally would be the best of all, is disliked because the railing cuts off the view of the stage.

So, decides the Salem Symphony society, which sponsors the concert, why not give the unwanted front row seats to someone who would really appreciate them—namely, students from the Oregon School for the Blind.

Some 30 to 40 students from the school will be guests of the society at the Tuesday performance. And not only will it be a treat for them, it will be an educational experience. Those selected to attend will be students with a definite interest in studying music as a vocation, says Mrs. Sig Unander, secretary of the Salem Symphony society.

Considerable difference between the coming Tuesday night concert and the one held last Friday night at South Salem high school. The Fats Domino group gave out with a solid two hours of rock 'n' roll beat.

The stage show failed to draw more than a third of what was expected—perhaps typical of the draw of entertainment offerings in Salem. With the huge staff of 100 persons to pay, promotion expenses, living expenses (they stayed overnight at the Senator), travel expenses (chartered airlines), etc., it was estimated they lost about $2,000.

One thing that must be said for the entertainers. Despite the small crowd and financial loss, they didn't let up a whit in their efforts to put on a good show—and that held true for both performances.

Crowd seemed to appreciate the show. It was warm with applause after a slow start but generally short with the screams and yells despite the fact that it was about 80 per cent teenagers. One young gal at back of auditorium, however, drew more attention from crowd around her at times than the musicians as she ecstatically screamed her approval of a new selection of entertainer.

Rhythm was good and even school Superintendent Carl Aschenbrenner and Athletic Director Harold Hauk were seen keeping time to the music with tapping feet.

One young rock 'n' roll fan commented later that she appreciated the show twice as much after being at the Fats Domino dance in Fresno last fall where one of the well-publicized riots occurred. She saw the thing start when four young men who had obviously been drinking got into an argument among themselves and fists began swinging. In a matter of minutes, the whole joint was at it.

That's a real mess as police came to break up the riot and ambulances carried off the wounded, she said. She prefers the more sedate type of performance seen in Salem.

SEVERAL FACTORS BLAMED

County Welfare Funds Just About Gone for Fiscal Year

By FRED ZIMMERMAN
Capital Journal Writer

For a variety of reasons, none of which apparently could have been foreseen or avoided, the Marion County Welfare commission finds itself in imminent danger of having to incur a bottle of red ink.

In spite of a rather gloomy outlook, there is little possibility that there will be any sharp curtailment in general assistance. The commission has been able to shift funds from a few departments where the demand has not been so great to the one where the load has been heavy. Then, too, the federal government added a few thousand dollars to the program last November.

So far the commission has not been forced to call on the emergency board for assistance. This might have been the case had it not been for the relative responsibility portion of the over-all program.

In the case of the division of general assistance, the budget item of $22,000 set apart last July 1, to carry through the fiscal year ending June 30, has been exceeded by more than $44,000.

Migrants Bring Problems
In discussing the situation Kenneth Peterson, administrator, said financial problems have been brought about by economic conditions, changes in unemployment compensation laws and an apparent immigration of families who have reached the state with virtually no visible means of support.

While not fully obligated to care for the migrants, they are given assistance as far as finances will permit.

"Many people have reached the valley totally unprepared to look after themselves," said the administrator. Housing, food and utilities have constituted a decided drain upon the county.

Another factor in the situation is the one involving the upgrading of the standard of living. The State Welfare commission, taking note of the increased cost of living, has fixed certain minimums for the various services involved and the counties are compelled to live up to them.

Involves Public Welfare
These increases involve hospital.

MANAGEMENT

Plumbers Set To Meet Here With Mediator

A federal mediator will meet with union and management representatives here this evening in an attempt to end a 10-day labor stoppage involving Willamette valley plumbers.

In Portland, agreement between the plumbers and contractors was reached a week ago.

Conducting tonight's session, which is to be held in the Marion county courthouse, will be Clyde Deal, Portland federal mediator. Spokesmen for the parties involved in the dispute will be Vern Collins, president of the Willamette Valley Plumbing and Heating association and D. W. Burroughs, business agent of Local 347, Plumbers and Steamfitters.

The work stoppage has been termed a "lockout" by the union and a "strike" by management. The plumbers have been off work since March 1.

The union is reported to be seeking a 35 cent an hour pay increase and fringe benefits. More than 100 are involved in the dispute.
