

Post Headquarters Building Being Razed at Camp Adair

Camp Adair Structures Razed

Piles of lumber, a brick vault and chimney shown in the upper picture are all that remain of the post headquarters, first building constructed at Camp Adair in

It Was the First Of Structures There

Post Headquarters, first of all 1,800 structures erected at Camp Adair, Willamette Valley's $32,000,000 building project, rushed to completion in six months during 1942, is now being razed for salvage materials.

Post Headquarters housed offices associated with cantonment construction including those of Col. R. E. M. Des Isles, chief engineer in charge of the entire project. Located on an upper floor of this building were drafting rooms in which many Salek men prepared and checked plans for the camp's 1,800 structures.

Wrecking Many Buildings

Besides Post Headquarters, E. S. Ritter & Co. is wrecking 14 other buildings for salvage. Among these is the transportation building, 260 feet in length, 25 feet wide and with six wings. Some structures have been purchased from the wrecker and are being moved in sections by churches and other organizations.

Col. Des Isles told the Salem Chamber of Commerce, Feb. 26, 1942, that "speed is the order, costs are forgotten."

During the summer of 1942, no less than 8,000 men were employed in construction at Camp Adair and the payroll was $2,000,000 a month. The first soldier arrived in June and because no barracks was completed to receive him, he was bedded down in a fire hall.

4 Divisions Trained

Four infantry divisions were trained at Camp Adair between 1942 and 1945: 70th, or Trailblazer; 91st or Powder River; 96th, or Deadeye; and the 104th, or Timberwolf division.

Most troops vacated Camp Adair during August of 1944 and when the camp was declared surplus Dec. 18, 1945, Col. Lawrence Norman, commander since 1945, had only a station complement and a group of German war prisoners there. Many men, trained in those divisions, later became residents of this area.
