'Dan' Missile Set to Probe Solar Flares

First Firing Planned At Geophysical Year Start

By Frank Carey

Associated Press Science Reporter WASHINGTON (# — A missile named "Dan" — actually a guided missile with a rocket hitchhiker — will be used in a new attempt to probe one of nature's greatest mysteries, soar "flares."
A team of Naval Research Laberatory researchers disclosed today that 14 such missiles will be fired during 1957. The first firing, they said, is planned for July 1, the beginning of the international geophysical year.
Since solar flares occur only infrequently, the initial firing may not actually be made on that specific date.

The Navy team reported to the American Rocket Society that the Dan missiles will be ready to try for new information on the "flares" which sometimes interfere with radio reception, cause sparking on telegraph wires and create a general disturbance of the earth's magnetic field.

The Dan, they said, is a combination of the Army's guided missile "Nike" with a six-inch diameter rocket known as the "Deacon" — the latter presumably released when the Nike reaches its maximum altitude. The Nike alone has a range unofficially estimated at about 20 to 25 miles, and the Deacon's range is estimated at about 45 to 55 miles, giving a total conceivable altitude of some 75 miles for the combination.

Research Last Year Told Researcher T. A. Chubb and two associates made brief mention of the Dan plans in a prepared report disclosing results of research on solar flares last summer. This research was done with another unusual combination — a Deacon rocket carried as a hitch-liker by a high-altitude balloon. This combination is known as a "Rockoon."

A balloon carrys the Deacon to an altitude of about 15 miles and floats there until launched by a signal radioed from technicians below.

The rocket carries instruments for detecting the effect of solar flares on the atmosphere, and this is radioed back to observers. Last summer's studies, the scientists reported, were concentrated on the particular aspect of solar flares responsible for radio fladeout.

The researchers said flares on the sun occur only infrequently and, since most of them last only 10 to 30 minutes, it's necessary to have a rocket in readiness for prompt firing.

The hovering balloons provided such a system last year.

This summer, the 14 longer-range Dans are scheduled to be fired from an unidentified island base, presumably by remote control.
