While Warm Springs' first housing development at Greenville was being dismantled, 85 new dwellings were constructed to relieve crowded living conditions. The reservation's first apartment complex arose near the rodeo grounds, offering twenty townhouse-style apartments to singles and small families (5).

Homes for twenty senior citizens, complete with wood stoves and smokehouses, were occupied reluctantly by some and eagerly by others (2). A community building when complete will feature a fireplace, kitchen, saunas, whirlpool baths, and a patio (2).

Thirty additional HUD homes or rent large, widely-spaced and fifteen families chose to buy or rent large, widely-spaced homes atop a bench called Greeley Heights.

The far reaches of the reservation began to look more attractive to those shunning the concentrated development of the agency area. Telephones put Sidwalter and Miller Flats "in touch," leaving only the Tenino Valley "disconnected." (3)

Water that trickled into Simnasho and Schoolie Flat homes became a steady flow with the construction of a new water system, (4) and north end residents talked more confidently of a plan for additional housing and community buildings.

Work also began on the design of a new water system using Deschutes River water to meet the demands of Kah-Nee-Ta, Dry Creek and Agency.

Industry was given room to grow with the development of the Warm Springs Industrial Park. Now the site of the Sub-assembly plant, where electrical components are assembled (1), and the vehicle pool, which serves the tribal and BIA vehicle fleets, the park also has space available for private contractors to erect shops or work areas.

The coming year has more progress in store, with the expansion of the apartment complex and mobile home park and the development of subdivisions in Simnasho and at a rural location. Two major public buildings are also in the design stages — a criminal justice facility and a community learning center to house education and media services.
