Falling rocks foils trucker

Falling rocks after heavy rainfalls over the weekend caused a double trailered truck to run off the road near the Pelton Dam turn-off early Monday morning. The driver, Don Neil, walked away from the wreck despite the battered condition of the vehicle.

According to Don Miles, president of the Burns-Portland Express, Inc., the driver of the truck was heading north down the Vanora grade on Highway 26 towards Portland. The truck hit a rock on the road causing the steering to go out.

Neil was unable to manipulate the truck and it crossed the opposite lane, went over one embankment and then over another embankment before it finally came to rest with the back trailer resting precariously on the front trailer.

The tractor was completely demolished, says Miles. The trailers were salvaged but needed some repair.

Driver Neils went home to Burns immediately following a visit to Mountain View Hospital where he was treated for an abrasion on the forehead.

ROCKS AT FAULT—Tractor and double trailer unit toppled down two embankments on Hwy. 26 before coming to rest.

Project—Preserving Indian arts

American Indian people know that they must work against time to record the remaining knowledge of their elders and to preserve the traditional works of art which are the distinguishing symbols of their tribal identity. However, many people in the various Indian communities, although willing, lack the specific art documentation skills to accomplish this.

The UCLA American Indian Studies Center is addressing itself to this need and, with the assistance of the Folk Arts Area of the National Endowments for the Arts, is developing the project entitled, Preserving American Indian Arts: A Technical Guide.

The goal of this project is to encourage American Indian people to research and document their own traditional arts and to introduce effective techniques which they can readily use to accomplish this.

The objective is to produce a set of slides and an accompanying handbook, to be distributed free of charge, to five hundred American Indian organizations, tribal and urban, which will generate wide interest and demonstrate a number of professional techniques which Indian people can use in their communities to research, document, and interpret their own traditional arts. The set of slides, well-suited for presentation at Indian organization meetings, will show a number of relatively simple and low-cost, yet highly effective techniques from a variety of art-related production fields such as photography, graphic design, exhibition design, sound recording, videography, and audio-visual production.

The slides will picture Indian people performing these activities will show some of the exciting results which they have achieved. This slide presentation will be designed to show professional-level art production standards, yet it will demonstrate to Indian people that they, too, can achieve similar successful results with a minimum of cost, equipment, and training.

A handbook, designed to accompany the slides, will serve as a kind of "toolkit" and community work guide, and will provide step-by-step procedures for the techniques which were pictured in the slides. This handbook containing many black and white photographs and illustrations, will also offer particulars about the organization and planning, equipment, resources, and services required to produce these art documentation materials.

The studies center welcomes information which you may have about your tribe or group's activities.
