Fishermen air discontent at meeting—

area. However, a number of complaints were voiced by the fishermen and their families about past law enforcement officials and the tactics used during arrests. Also, a question was raised about the Indians receiving their "fair share" as designated by Judge Belloni. In addition, others voiced their opposition about one law enforcement agency governing the four Treaty Tribes since all four tribes were governed by their own individual treaties. It was expressed that by going under another law agency other than their own was an encroachment upon each tribe's sovereign right to be self-governing.

The Yakima tribes' position as stated by a Yakima tribal "observer," Delbert Olney, was that the Yakima's had a code to govern the fishing of the Yakima people. Yakima fishermen backed this position but voiced discontentment with the Yakima enforcement personnel. Olney questioned just what fishing rights the Warm Springs, Umatilla and Nez Perce had on the Columbia River. He made reference to a Huntington Treaty which he said the Warm Springs signed in 1865 relinquishing fishing rights on the river for irrigation and farm equipment. He went on to say that, to the best of his knowledge, Umatilla and Nez Perce never had fishing rights on the Columbia through their treaties.

Warm Springs Chief of Police Jeffery Sanders expressed disappointment that the new code was not discussed and that the concerns raised at the meeting were not new to law enforcement personnel. But because the agenda was not followed, discussion of the code never came about. However, following the day-long meeting, copies of the newly written code were made available to the fishermen.

Several Yakima tribal members expressed their feelings that often the tribal councils were not aware of the ordeals facing the people who lived on the river and fished for a living. The Lacey Act, legislation that was used in the recent "sting operation" on the river against a number of fishermen, was discussed. Olney said it was his understanding that nothing in the Lacey Act repealed any of the sovereign rights of tribes to regulate their fishermen so the charges should have been tribal violations heard by tribal courts and not Federal courts.

Olney went on to define subsistence, the minimum amount of food and shelter to maintain life, saying this no longer applied to subsistence fishing because the people do not get enough fish to maintain life. He said the treaty gave the Indians the right to barter and that bartering was a way of life for the Indian but with the new code, bartering is a violation. Olney said, "We (the Yakima) stand on the treaty."

One topic expected to also be discussed, but was not, was the newly formed police department which will soon start working in Zone 6 checking nets and enforcing the new code. Two officers will be hired from each of the four treaty tribes and work under the field supervisor hired by the Columbia River Inter-Tribal Fish Commission at the CRITFC Hood River office. It was originally planned to have the police officers on the job by July 1, but due to delays, they won't begin until mid-July. The positions are co-financed by CRITFC and the four tribal governments.

The new code, which has been approved by three of the four treaty tribes with Yakima not approving, will be enforced by the new police force when they begin working. Warm Springs Tribal Council approved the code and included it as a section in their present tribal Law and Order Code. It can be found under chapter 340, Fishing Code.

Renovation of the existing detention and administrative facilities of the Warm Springs police department will soon be underway. The BIA has appropriated $1.5 million for the renovation and when complete in about 18 months, the jail will be fully modernized. The current holding capacity for 15 prisoners is 15—when completed, the facility will have enough cell space for 45 men and women adults and juveniles. The portion of the blueprint that appears darker will be the new portion of the facility. That, which is lighter, is the existing facility.
