

Children's teeth care important

by Sandy Boers
IHS Hygienist

Q. When are the baby teeth lost and when do the permanent teeth come in?

A. The first permanent tooth to come in is usually a back tooth that appears at about age five or six. Because of this, it is commonly called the "six-year molar." It comes in behind the last baby molar and often isn't recognized by the parent as a permanent tooth because no baby tooth has been lost. At about this same age, the two lower front teeth are lost and replaced by permanent ones. The rest of the front permanent teeth come in during the next two years. The rest of the baby teeth will be replaced up until the time the child is about twelve or thirteen.

Q. Why are the two upper front teeth so big?

A. The front teeth always look too big when they come in. They look this way because the baby teeth around them are so small and because a six-year-old's face is very small. As children get older, their face will grow along with the rest of their bodies and then the teeth won't look so large. Tooth size is usually inherited from the child's mom and dad.

Q. Why do the permanent teeth look so yellow?

A. Permanent teeth are normally yellower than baby teeth, but they look even more so when compared to the very white teeth. Bright white permanent teeth are not very common.

Q. My child's new permanent front teeth have uneven edges. Is something wrong?

A. No, this is normal. The rough edges will wear smooth with normal use.

Q. What about the big space between my eight-year-old's two upper front teeth?

A. Usually the space will close up by itself within the next few years as other permanent teeth come in. If there is a problem, the dentist will recognize it.

Q. My child's baby teeth had a lot of cavities. Will the permanent teeth be any healthier?

A. No, unless steps are taken to avoid cavities. In most cases, this means keeping the child away from sweet, sticky foods and drinks and keeping a healthier diet. Also teeth need to be kept clean by brushing and flossing. Good habits need to be formed as early as possible.
