

Bernice Mitchell, treasurer for MOIHS, received, on behalf of the Society, a $5,000 grant from Bill Martin, President of the Madras branch of the U.S. Bank. The grant will be used for a video project titled "Warm Springs, Today." The eight to 10 minute video will be used for public relations.

Executive director hired for MOIHS

In the near future, Warm Springs will have a museum and cultural learning center in which tribal members and visitors will get a complete overview of tribal history and much more.

But, there's much to be done before that goal becomes reality. Hired earlier this month to assist and guide the Tribes toward that ultimate facility is Duane King, Ph.D., most recently from the Cherokee National Historical Society in Tahlequah, Oklahoma. King's expertise in anthropology and museum work is extensive.

King was executive director of the Cherokee National Museum for five years, during which time he also directed the operation of two restored Cherokee villages and produced the "Trail of Tears" outdoor drama. Prior to working in Tahlequah, King was director of the Museum of the Cherokee Indian in Cherokee, North Carolina for seven years. King was also assistant professor of Anthropology at the University of Tennessee for two years. He received his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees from the University of Georgia.

"The new tribal museum will be designed to meet the needs of the local community and the visiting public," according to King. The story of the Confederated Tribes will be presented through innovative displays and multi-media exhibits. It will be possible to obtain an overview of the Tribes' history and traditions in a tour lasting an hour to an hour-and-a-half. However, for those who want more detailed information, the museum will also house an archives and library, learning labs and a classroom for workshops and seminars.

Since 1974, the Middle Oregon Indian Historical Society has spent over $557,000 acquiring tribal artifacts for the museum. "It is important that these artifacts be presented in their proper context," said King. Without understanding the use or the significance, even the most prized relics become meaningless, he added.

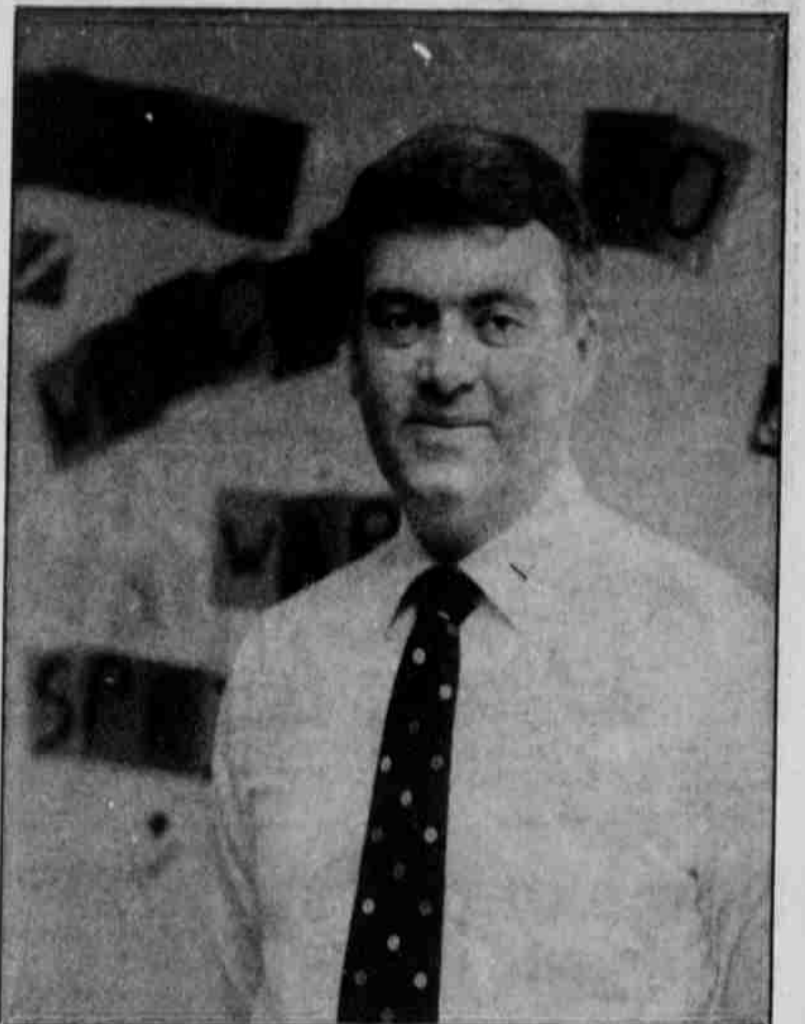

King is impressed with the stored collection and the artifacts displayed in cases at the administration building and Kah-Nee-Ta. "No other tribe in the country has made such a conscientious effort to collect and preserve its treasures. It is the best collection I've seen, not in a museum," King stated.

The museum plans include an open storage facility, which would permit viewing of artifacts, not on exhibit, in a protected and environmentally controlled setting.

Although several sites are being considered for the museum, the one receiving the most attention is located near Highway 26 across from the Senior Citizen residential area, on a terrace above Shitike Creek. "The Board feels strongly that the museum should be community oriented and readily accessible to the traveling public," King said. This location would meet those criteria as well as provide space for outdoor interpretive exhibits.

King estimates that the museum will be 20,000 to 30,000 square feet with completion in two to three years.

King, who is a native of Tennessee, has never before lived west of
