"Spilyay Speaks"

It was once said that Bush was concerned about the home less...the ones who don't have a summer home. Bush accused Dakakis of a total lack of understanding of our military and called the Nov. 8, election a referendum on military policy. Dakakis criticized Bush for opposing increases in the minimum wage and for advocating a trade policy that he said seemed like a re-run of "Let's Make A Deal." To this date there hasn't been any real address made on any issue and on what steps they would take to solve the problem. Take the death penalty and the abortion issue, which both seem to sway away from as much as possible. When ever the question arises they start to make their remarks on what the issue is all about but they never say what they would do about the situation, they always shift the question on the other guy, of what he is doing wrong about the whole thing, but they never say what they would do themselves.

Bush said that he will fight to the end and if any of his staff are not doing what they should be doing in the campaign, they are history. Dukakis, on the other hand, does mingle with the mainstream of the public and that's out on the streets with the working people asking questions and trying to give answers. It will be a very interesting race for the presidency. Well, we've had some doozies in the past and seem to survive, but to do that again and again is not the best for this country.

Speaking of candidates, a tribe in Montana had a couple of War Bonnets for vice-presidential candidate Dan Quayle. The tribe asked Quayle to come and visit the reservation and his reply was, "I don't have the time." Later on, that tribe received a call saying that Quayle wanted to use those War Bonnets at another gathering. The Tribe's response was that if he didn't have time to visit the reservation they didn't have time to deliver the head dresses to Quayle. And again, they thought that those head dresses were appropriate for Quayle because they were fake; made out of turkey feathers, they were.

Faces of Reservation wins top honors

Cynthia D. Stowell is author of the book Faces of a reservation.

The book "Faces of a Reservation," written by Cynthia D. Stowell, wins top honors at the second annual Oregon Book Awards ceremonies, put on for the second year by the Oregon Institute of Literary Arts. The ceremonies were held at the Intermediate Theater of the Portland Arts for the Performing Arts.

"Faces of a Reservation," Published by the Oregon Historical society Press, won the Frances Fuller Victor Award for Creative Non-fiction. "Faces," is a combination of photographs and text of people of the Warm Springs Indian Reservation.

There were five finalists for the nonfiction award which included, "A Field of Innocence," by Jack Estes, Lake Oswego; "Crossing Open Ground," by Barry Lopaz, (last years winner); "Totem Poles," by Edward Malin of Portland; "Reach of Tide," by Sam McKinsey of Portland.

It was a great accomplishment for Cynthia who in the past spent some time working and living among the people of Warm Springs. Cynthia said, "This award goes to the people of Warm Springs, too, for sharing their lives with fellow Oregonians. I hope Warm Springs are proud of the award and proud of the book."

"Faces of a Reservation" is now in its second printing and should be ready well before Christmas. The second printing will have soft backs that should reduce the price considerably and will be available through the Oregon Historical Society in Portland, Oregon.
