There's more to weight loss than dieting

Understanding this principle is an important step toward developing a life-style that permits you to maintain your ideal weight.

If you carry around more pounds than the weight tables say is ideal, you have lots of company. About 25 percent of Americans are overweight, and more are joining their ranks everyday.

Although dieting is popular, it doesn't cure overweight. Dieting deals only with how much food

Weight control is more than diet- and the types of food a person eats. It doesn't deal with what makes a person start eating.

Dicting also doesn't help people change their social situation and interaction with other people. To lose weight, a person needs support from people at home and/or work. Analyze your eating habits. Find out your problem times, situations and foods by asking what you eat, when, where and with whom.

In one example, a person found that she overate only when her friend visited. Some people find they only overeat one type of food, such as cookies. Others fear not being able to stop eating.

Once problem situations are identified, many people are able to develop strategies for managing their weight. If only one or two foods are "problems", perhaps the food can be eliminated from the house

If eating too fast is a problem, people can slow down by putting their fork down between bites and by taking a two-minute rest break in the middle of eating. Learning to eat slowly and taking a break in the middle of a meal is often very helpful to people who cannot stop eating once they start.

Most people find eating regular meals is important to long-term weight control. When meals are skipped, people tend to make up for it at the next meal by eating a little extra. Getting too hungry before eating also makes it hard to quit cating.

To determine how much you should cat, allow 10 calories for every pound of body weight. Adjust the calorie level downward as weight is lost. Eating 10 calories of food for every pound of body weight prevents the matabolic slowdown that can make losing weight even harder.

Exercise is also important. If a person sits a lot, it'll be much harder to lose weight and keep it off.

For people who cat when suffering from boredom or stress, physical activity can be especially beneficial. Physical activity uses up calories and it's hard to eat while exercising. Regular physical activty also has been found to help nost people keep the weight off.

Reactions to loss differ

Whatever the disaster-fire, flood, blizzard or loss of financial security-the the loss of home, property, livestock and money can make a significant difference in the lives of those affected.

The loss of hope and material possessions can be similar in impact to the death of a loved one. It is a time of grief.

People normally go through five stages of grief following a serious loss. Fortunately, friends and relatives can provide some specific types of help at each stage.

Shock and denial. In this stage the person may feel confused and be unable to function or perform normally easy tasks. He or she may deny the loss and may avoid dealing with the reality of the situation.

explore alternatives at this stage in the grief process. Just being available physically is important. Offer support and help with everyday

Anger. During the anger stage, the affected person can understand one can be a target.

Realize it is normal and healthy for a person to feel anger over the loss of something valuable. Allow the person to vent those angry feelings.

Do not take those feelings personally nor make them more than what they really are. Diffuse the feelings of anger if possible and be a good listener and friend.

Depression and detachment. If no one is around to be angry with. the person may turn the anger inside, causing depression. The person may withdraw from activities and people.

If you have a friend who is emotional-one who cries or is withdrawn-he or she may be blaming himself or herself for the situation. Be empathetic and sensitive and continue to listen. Help the person avoid blaming either himself/herself or others.

Return-to-normal state. Eventually it is possible for a person to return to a normal stage after having explored acceptable alternatives to the situation, Keep in mind that the normal stage will not be the same as it was before the loss.

People in a family will experience these stages at different rates. The entire grief process may last several months-or longer. This is

deal with stress

Occasionally you may notice small, greasy-looking streaks on your polyester blouses when you remove them from the dryer. This can be caused by sheets of fabric softener.

Fabric softeners used in automatic dryers do a good job of controlling static cling, but occasionally cause stains, which appear as small oily spots or streaks.

Two situations in particular may encourage staining:

1. Overloading the dryer prevents the softener from tumbling freely, thus resulting in the soften-

Dialogue. Given time and support of others, depression eventually subsides and the person will begin to reach out and talk-and listen to others. This is the best in washing and drying. T-shirts of 100 percent cotton resist pilling (fuzzy suface balls) better than

Stress-The good, bad, manageable

According to the National Mental Health Association, "anxiety and tension are essential functions of living." Stress is nothing modern, but lately we have found new ways of defining it and dealing with it. Everybody has the ability to live through periods of emotional upheaval; to experience anxiety is quite normal. But what are the signs that tension is getting out of hand? The following questions offer some indication.

1. Do minor problems throw you for a loop?

2. Do you find it hard to get along with people you used to be compatible with?

3. Does nothing seem to give you pleasure?

4. Are you unable to stop thinking about your problems? 5. Do you feel suspicious and mistrustful much of the time? 6. Do you feel trapped and/or inadequate?

If you answer yes to most of these questions, it's time to do something. Here are some positive steps you can take.

1. Find someone to confide in. Speak frankly and ask for an objective opinion.

2. Take a short respite, even if that only means an afternoon off or an evening at the movies.

3. Resolve to work off your anger or suspicion in hard but useful labor, or in exercise.

4. Shun the urge to be a superman/superwoman. 5. Give the other fellow a break.

A tolerant attitude can make life easier for you.

6. Try something new. Creative activity, such as painting, carpentry, cooking and needlework, provide a sense of accomplishment as well as peaceful relaxation.

7. Take your relaxation seriously. Exercise and other activities require personal commitment. 8. If you feel you need professional help, get it. Your doctor, local mental health association or even your telephone directory can

Keep resume concise, accurate, neat

One of the keys to writing an effective resume is learning what to omit. The basic rule is to exclude everything that is not directly related to your ability to do the specific job for which you are applying. A concise resume should include: *Your name, address and phone number at the top of the page. *Job objective. While there is more than one right way to arrange information on a resume, the job objective often fits nicely as the second item on the page.

*Job experience. A chronological or functional description of the work you have done. This summary is the heart of the resume.

*Education. Mention the highest level of education completed and any specialized training you have had. Indicate degrees earned, subject majored in, and the year you graduated (if you choose.) Add grade point average if you are a recent graduate and your grades were good.

*Membership and honors. During the early years out of school, list honors you won as a student. Later most academic honors diminish in importance unless they are nationally recognized (like membership in Phi Betta Kappa). If you have to explain the honor, it doesn't belong on your resume unless it is directly applicable to the job for which you are applying.

*Once your resume is drafted, evaluate it. Get some help from a knowledgeable friend if you can, but if you are left to your own devices, at least ask yourself these five questions:

1. Is it brief? Never use a resume to express your philosophy. Stick to facts. A resume should be no longer than two pages; one is usually better.

2. Did you minimize use of the prounon "I"? Use "I" only where anything else sound awkward.

3. Is the tone professional and straightforward? A sense of humor can be a valuable asset on the job, but clever remarks seldom "work" on a resume. Save them for the interview

4. Did you toot your own horn but not blast it? If you kept the department from "going down the tubes," say so, but do it by stating facts. Example: "Improved office efficiency 35 percent by creating flow chart that enabled two clerks to complete work formerly handled by three."

5. Were you truthful? Employers are getting tougher in their screening methods and are impatient with inflated claims.

Add the finishing touches. Everything about your resume is a reflection of you. Before you go to the printer, check for misspellings and grammatical errors. Ask several people to proofread for you, and see whether they have any suggestions about improving the overall appearance of your material.

When your final draft has been checked, get it professionally printed or print is yourself with a laser or letter-quality printer. Choose a plain typeface and use standard 81/2"x11" paper. Black ink on a good quality white or offwhite paper is still the best choice. Other colors of ink (or paper) look less professional and may keep your resume from getting the serious consideration it deserves
