

Let the work begin...

Four Tribal Council members and three WSFPI managers were on hand Friday, April 28 for ground breaking ceremonies in the mill yard. Considerable excavation, that began May 1, will be required to make way for the new $12 million small log operation. The purpose of testing, say program officials, is to counter "denial" which is a critical factor in substance abuse. Drug testing often exposes denial and facilitates rehabilitation. The responsibility for recovery lies with the individual whether the organization is testing or not.

It has been and continues to be the hope of Tribal Council that individuals will continue to accept the responsibility for necessary change. Hopefully, those individuals will become even more valuable members of the community, helping themselves as well as their families.

He will be responsible for Interior programs serving more than 1.4 million Indians and Alaska natives in the United States.

"Eddie Brown has a broad background in intergovernmental relations with native Americans," Lujan said. "This, combined with his extensive social service education and prior experience at the Bureau of Indian Affairs, makes Eddie a welcome addition to the Department of the Interior."

Brown recently left his position as Director of the Arizona Department of Economic Security after two years in that post. Previously he spent one year as an associate professor and director of Community Affairs at Arizona State University. In 1985 he was a division chief for the BIA and prior to that, he was assistant director of the Arizona Department of Economic Security.

A Tohono O'odham/Yaqui, Brown is a member of the Pascua Yaqui Tribe. He received his Bachelor's of Social Science degree from Brigham Young University in 1970 and his Masters and Doctorate degrees in Social Work from the University of Utah in 1972 and 1975 respectively.

Nurse enjoys community

by Tina Aguilar

Paula Wegehaupt, a 24-year-old Chippewa Indian, was born on the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation in North Dakota. She lived there for nine years before moving to Portland, Oregon with her family.

Paula Wegehaupt

Paula attended the University of Portland for four years and received her bachelors of science degree in nursing. Her first year with IHS was in Gallup, New Mexico and the next two years will be here in Warm Springs.

She enjoys taking care of people and working in the health field. Her favorite field of nursing is pediatric, which is caring for children. Eventually, she would like to specialize in critical care pediatrics nursing.

Paula has been at the Warm Springs Clinic since August, 1988. She says the Warm Springs people are "nice and easy to talk with." When she was in Gallup, she said, it was hard to communicate with the people because most people spoke their native tongue. She commented that it's "nice when you can understand what is said."

If she were able to change anything at the local clinic it would be to have more staff, at least two more doctors and two additional nurses, plus a larger facility to care for the population of Warm Springs.

Although Paula will be getting married to Mark Van Dehey of Portland in July, she will still finish her two years here in Warm Springs.

Tribe establishes victims program

The Confederated Tribes of Warm Springs recently received a $35,000 grant to establish a Victim Assistance Program in Warm Springs. According to program coordinator, Deborah Jackson, the primary goal of the program is to make the criminal justice system more responsive to the people of Warm Springs, particularly to the victims of crime. If you have been a victim of burglary, sexual assault, domestic violence, child abuse, a traffic offense or any other crime, you understand what it means when we say the most forgotten people in our society today are the innocent victims of criminal conduct. The program has been established to change the emphasis of our criminal justice system so that some of its resources are used to help victims. "We all have one common goal, your well-being," said Jackson.

Expected benefits include, 1. Immediate response and support to victims' needs throughout the maze of legal systems in which a community member may be involved; 2. Coordination of services between tribal, federal, state and local agencies to serve victims of crime; 3. Safety and protection for victims of violent crime; 4. Increased awareness and knowledge in the community of services for crime victims; and, 5. Increased access to existing state Crime Victims Compensation Program to assist with reimbursement of financial losses related to injuries sustained as a result of crime.

Throughout the month of May, the program will be looking for volunteers to respond to crisis situations and help victims through the legal system. Volunteers will receive 40 hours of training in June before the program begins July 1, 1989.

If you are a crime victim, are interested in becoming a volunteer or just want more information about the program, call Jackson at 553-1161, ext. 357 or stop by the Justice Service Center and see her personally.

Deborah Jackson is coordinator of new tribal program.

Teamwork helps build community trust, credibility

Helping the task force develop efficient methods through which health will be improved is Jerry Enders, community development specialist of Stanford University's health promotion and disease prevention center. The key to success is teamwork, said Enders. By working together toward a common goal, community members develop trust among themselves. With the teamwork concept, an organized coalition, comprised of people with different interests, is formed. Everyone has different ideas and the philosophy that is formed represents all peoples' ideas. "The philosophy describes the principles and values which unify the community and tie it together so the work can be done," said Enders. The philosophy will be the guiding principle and is the foundation of the future.

By adhering to six major components in the teambuilding process, the community is sure to achieve its goal. First comes identification of problems and conflict within the community. Goals are then identified. These goals get action, give direction, focus resources in a common direction, are a statement of what will happen and determine what the community will accomplish. Change does not come without obstacles, said Enders. "But those road blocks can be overcome," he assured the group.

Once the obstacles are conquered, or at least identified, team priorities and objectives can be established. The task force can then develop an action plan. Following this comes the monitoring of progress.

Enders advised the group that many organizations identify the problems and obstacles and then go straight to work on the action plan. This process doesn't work, he said. Following the six major steps "reduces the risk of failure."

Because no one person has all the answers, teamwork is the most effective way in which solutions can be found. Teamwork also establishes credibility.

All task force meetings are open to the public. High school and college students and young parents concerned about the future are particularly encouraged to attend. The next meeting is scheduled for Wednesday, May 9 at the Agency Longhouse. The meeting will begin at 6:30 p.m. Robert Townsberg, health educator at the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, will be a guest at the meeting.

Task force members gathered in small groups to list health needs in the community.
