Education conference to focus on minorities, women

The effects of education reform and school restructuring on minority and female students will be addressed by teachers and other national experts at the National Education Association's annual conference on concerns of minorities and women.

A full weekend of discussions and debate, including five major trend sessions and 11 workshops, will be conducted at the Westin

Crown Center in Kansas City, Mo., June 30-July 1.

"This conference is designed to work on solutions to lingering inequities -- injustices that will be built into the reform movement unless we extricate them now," said NEA President Keith Geiger.

"U.S. public education must complete the job of making female and minority students full partners in the learning process," he added. "If restructuring efforts now under way shortchange these groups, the United States simply will not be competitive internationally."

Five national experts and educational pioneers will join Geiger, NEA Vice-President Bob Chase, Secretary-Treasurer Roxanne Bradshaw and Executive Director Don Cameron in exploring what must be done.

Other major speakers include Shirley McBay, director of the Carnegie Institute's ground-breaking Quality Education for Minorities project; management consultant Jim Thomas, an Alaskan native long recognized for his leadership in health and economic development; Arther Wise, who assumes the presidency of the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education July 1; and author Susan Otterbourg, program and systems development specialist.

Special recognition will be given to John Morton-Finney, 101 years old, a Black education pioneer who taught for nearly half a century. At present, he is the nation's oldest active attorney.

The conference precedes NEA's annual meeting and Representative Assembly, which will attract 10,000 delegates and members to Kansas City July 3-8.

The National Education Association, with more than two million members, is the nation's largest union/professional association.
