Tribal budget workshops to involve members

As part of a new communication effort, tribal members will be asked for their ideas at the beginning of the annual tribal budget process. Community involvement workshops are planned to start this June, with additional group or area meetings to follow. Information from the meetings will provide managers and supervisors direction for their initial 1992 budget proposals.

Community involvement with the budget has, in the past, been limited to October and November - after the Tribal Council's review and posting of the proposed budget. "We want to get the community involved in setting direction before managers start working on budgets. These meetings will offer a forum for people to talk about what they feel is important," said Ken Smith, tribal CEO. "They are a result of exploring ways to increase community participation in our planning and decision-making," he added.

The June workshops will include a brief summary of 1990 accomplishments, current program directions and financial information. Most of the time will be devoted to individual or small group comments. The proposed dates for the workshops are June 24, 25 and 26. Meeting times and locations will be posted. Call the Governmental Affairs and Planning Office for more information at 553-3270.

Voters pass levies

Warm Springs voters helped pass both the 509-J School District operating levy and the Jefferson County operating levy.

A total of 792 yes votes and 505 no votes were cast at the election for school funding. Warm Springs voters cast 63 yes and 2 no votes for the $4,888,354 levy.

Warm Springs voters also cast 57 of the 1113 yes votes and 7 of the 808 no votes for the county operating levy of $1,766,891.

Two-thirds of the school districts throughout the state passed their levy requests, which helps districts before they fall under the property tax limits of Measure 5. After Measure 5 takes effect July 1, districts will have to turn to the legislature when they need more money.

Deschutes River Management Plan includes development, restrictions

In an effort to resolve crowding problems on the lower 100 miles of the Deschutes River, a 448-page draft plan has been released.

The 20-member Deschutes River Policy Group which includes representatives from the government, Warm Springs Tribe and citizens, designed the plan. It outlines restrictions on jet boats and riverbank camping as well as a system of allocating boating permits which is scheduled for implementation in three years.

The idea of an "all-user fee" has been suggested which would call for fees from bank fishermen, hikers, bicyclists and other visitors to the river.

The plan also identifies $19 million in needed improvements which include a visitor center in Maupin, new campgrounds and boat launches and improved roads. This portion of the Deschutes River receives a quarter-million visitor days each year.

Ten public hearings are scheduled to allow public testimony before a final version of the plan is produced. The first restriction on the river will occur in the summer of 1992.

Copies of the draft plan are available for public review at Bureau of Land Management office, Oregon Parks and Recreation Department offices and at the Warm Springs Natural Resources office.
