Grant makes help available for caregivers
by Michelle L. Klampa
The Bulletin

The state has awarded a $16,000 grant to a tri-county coalition, creating a respite care network for people who care for ailing or disabled family members.

The money will be used to establish a central information and referral service for round-the-clock caregivers in need of a break, said Marsha Clearwalker, project coordinator.

A number of respite services are available in Crook, Deschutes and Jefferson Counties, Clearwalker said, but many families do not know they are there. The network will be a central point of contact for respite services.

The tri-county grant was one of 13 awarded across the state. Each county will use the money to develop such respite-care networks following a directive from the 1997 state Legislature. Respite care programs will be established in all Oregon counties by 2003.

The networks aim to strengthen families, keep caregivers healthy and avoid institutionalizing people who need 24-hour care.

"Our main goal is to intervene so that families don't burn out", Clearwalker said.

The tri-county network will be in place beginning July 1. It will have information for families providing care to children, adults and seniors with illnesses, disabilities or special needs.

Once the network is established, organizers hope to secure additional grants or other funds so they can expand it. The seed money will operate the program for the first year; smaller grants are expected from the state to keep the program running in following years.

Eventually, organizers want to recruit volunteers to help with the network, provide caregiver training and additional respite care for providers. They also hope to offer some financial help for families who need respite care but can't afford it, Clearwalker said.

The Deschutes County Human Services is the coordinating agency for the network but Clearwalker also is building an advisory board of representatives from each county, local respite care service agencies and families who use the respite care services.

If you're interested in joining the board or would like to volunteer with the network, call Clearwalker at 541-385-3248. After July 1, that number will also be used for the network's information and referral service. The next Tri-County Lifespan Respite Care Coalition Meeting will be Friday July 10, 1998 from 10 a.m. to 12 noon at the Deschutes County service building in Bend.
