The five tribes — Umatilla, Cow Creek, Grand Ronde, Siletz, and Warm Springs p began the project in 1996 with the desire to expand tourism opportunities and tourism marketing on each of their reservations. communities

The first product from the effort is a full-color, multi-page brochure entitled, "Discover Oregon. One Nation at a time." It was completed in March and is being distributed throughout Oregon. This project can serve as a model to pool resources, draw upon the common threads of tribal heritage, and open more economic doors for tribes around the country," said Paula Wallis, project manager and Tourism Coordinator in the Umatilla Tribes' Economic Development Department. She added that in addition to the five tribes, the project has enabled working partnerships with the Affiliated Tribes of Northwest Indians Economic Development Corporation, Oregon Tourism Commission, Oregon Economic Development Department Multi-Regional Boards and rural communities. Dave Tovy, Umatilla Tribe Executive Director, President of the Corporation and past chair of the Northeast Oregon Alliance, had this to say: "The need fro employment opportunities and stronger economic stability on reservations have prompted many tribes to search for regional strategies that help strive for self-sufficiency while also supporting traditional values and cultures. Tourism certainly is one of these strategies that we have embraced at ATNI and here at the Confederated Tribes of the Umatilla. We're pleased to be part of this successful project and hope to expand to other northwest tribes in the future.

Past recipients of the annual Governor's Innovative Tourism Development Award include the Oregon Department of Parks and Recreation, Joe Hunkinf of the Southern Oregon Visitors Association, and the North Central Oregon Regional Strategies Tourism Committee.
