Wildhorse set for festival

Fresh off their national tour with B.B. King, the American Indian blues band Indigenous has signed on to be the featured performance at the first annual Jammin' for Salmon Native American Music Festival August 4 & 5 at Wildhorse Casino Resort.

Jammin' for Salmon, sponsored by Wildhorse Casino Resort and Columbia River Inter-tribal Fish Commission, is a benefit event for the salmon recovery effort. The proceeds from the two-day music festival will go to Home for the Salmon, Salmon Corps, and Spirit of the Salmon. All performances will be held outside on the Wildhorse Powwow grounds where spectators will also be able to visit educational and informational booths, shop the arts & crafts vendors and eat at the food purveyors' tents. In addition to great musician, several celebrities and well-known dignitaries will visit the stage. One confirmed guest is Governor John Kitzhaber.

Rita Coolidge kicks off the event with a Friday night performance at 7 p.m. The opening act, starting at 5 p.m. is Reverend Gary Small & the Deacons playing raggae and rock. On Saturday the first act at 1 p.m. is the Indigenous Hawaiian group Kupa' aina and at 3 p.m. is Jim Boyd, a Colville Indian with tradition inspired folk rock. At 5 p.m. Branscombe Richmond takes the stage with his high energy sound and convivial humor. And at 7 p.m. is Indigenous.

Incendiary guitar, soulful vocals, and house-shaking rhythms are all trademarks of this indigenous family. Made up of two brothers, a sister and a cousin, Indigenous' stylist roots reach back to America's earliest form, the blues. They can trace their personal roots back even further.

Domestic violence must stop

How are we to stop Domestic Violence? If it happens and keeps happening and no one steps in to intervene, then we cannot stop domestic violence. Domestic violence is all about control and power. The person who wants control or power does not like himself very well (or in rare cases, the female is the abuser, doesn't like herself too well). Domestic violence is trying to make someone do something that the man wants done from blocking doorways, turning on light in the middle of the night and taking blankets off the bed, are ways to try and make the woman talk or "work things out". This is very unhealthy and very unacceptable behavior. Once a man hits, he will always hit. This very sad, very true though.

The abusive person usually grew up in a very unhealthy, dysfunctional environment. This type of behavior pattern is extremely hard to break. I do not think many people or even counselors realize how hard these issues can be to deal with. Not many people who were abused as children deal with their issues and let them go. They are in complete denial about the whole situation. The way this type of person reacts to things can give a hint as to where the person is coming from or what the person has gone through. This person takes everything personally. From comments on who abused them or family members in general.

Even if the family members are unhealthy (abusing alcohol, not taking care of themselves) the truth of the matter is that everyone needs to be responsible for him or her. They need to take care of their disease, treat their alcoholism, deal with their issues and then begin life. Get a job, take care of their total well-being. No one should have to foot the bill for someone who is drinking. It is very disrespectful to be under the influence and show up at family's houses or in-law houses. No one should have to feed someone who is under the influence because he or she is hungry and not relying on himself to get a job and feed his own self. For those of you that are in a relationship with another person who doesn't use, be respectful to that person and don't let your relatives, whether it is, brother, sister, cousin, friend, intrude upon your home. No one should have to deal with your relatives shortcomings. Especially your spouse or significant other. Lets open our eyes to the many unhealthy habits of dysfunctional, alcoholic family!
